Congo, kong'-go, or Zaire, sh'-er'-d, a river of equatorial Africa, one of the largest rivers in the world. Its basin, estimated at about 1,800,000 sq. m. is the largest after that of the Amazon. Little was known of its extent and importance until 1877 when its relations were determined by Stanley. The Congo has its origin in two head-waters, which unite in about lat. 0° 25' S. and lon. 27° E.—the Luepula, having its source (as the Chambesi and Chasi) in the highlands which extend between Lakes Tanganyika and Nyam, about 450 miles from the Indian Ocean, and the Lualaba which rises in the Lokinga Mountains lat. 12°-15° S., close to the head-waters of the Zambesi (See CHAMBEZI, LUAPULA, and LUALABA). Almost immediately after this junction the river receives on the right the Lukuga, an irregular feeder from Lake Tanganyika. From this point the Congo flows generally northward to the equator where it bends northward and completes the remarkable horseshoe curve which brings it down to its estuary in lat. 0° S. The total length of the river has been estimated at from 2500 to 2800 miles. Its principal tributaries, some of which are rivers almost of the first magnitude, are the Aruwimi, which rises within a short distance of the Albert Nyam, one of the head-basins of the Nile, Ubanghi (or Ubanghi-Welle) which also rises close to the Nile water parting the Sanga, and the Lemani and Kasai the two last-named being tributaries from the south. A most extensive system of navigable waters is added by these streams to the main river. The region drained by the Congo is a depressed basin, in its principal part between 1000 and 1500 feet elevation, which is bordered on its periphery by fairly lofty mountains or highland, and thence gradually towards the Atlantic Ocean. Not unlikely it represents a former interior sea, whose waters have gradually drained off into the Atlantic Ocean through the est which the Congo has opened across the coast mountains. The volume of water in the Congo is prodigious, but the navigability of the stream is broken by series of rapids in different parts of its course, and most unfortunately so in its lower section. Between Stanley Pool and the Tshela Falls the lowest of the rapids, there is a descent, in a direct distance of about 170 miles of 900 feet, the fall being through more than 30 distinct rapids. A railroad has hitherto been constructed between Matadi and Stanley Pool establishing commercial connection between the lower Congo and the middle course which affords uninterrupted navigation to Stanleyville, Stanley Falls or the Seven Rapids, a distance of 900 miles. The Congo is in this section a magnificent stream broadening out in places to 7-8 miles or more, and maintaining a very considerable depth. The discharge at Stanley Pool during high-water reaches probably 2,000,000 cubic feet per second. In its upper course the Congo is again badly interrupted by falls and rapids and, although still a noble water beyond Nyangwe, is hardly serviceable for navigation. The estuary is an open one, upward of 100 miles in length with a width of 5-6 miles, and having a depth of water of 300 feet or more. Below Matadi the most important stations on the river are Boma and Banana, the latter at the river's mouth. The mouth of the Congo was discovered by the Portuguese navigator Diogo Cam (Cao), in 1482.

Congo Free State, a political division of Africa, under the sovereignty of the King (Leopold II.) of the Belgians. It includes a small detached tract on the N. bank of the river Congo, extending from the sea inland to the French possessions, but its main area reaches from the mouth of the river Likoua (an affluent of the Congo from the N.) northward to lat. 5° N. thence E. to lon. 32° E. (just N. of the Albert Nyam) thence southward to about 13° 30' S. beyond Lake Bangweulu, and westward to a point on the S. bank of the river Congo, on the border of the Portuguese territory of Angola. The area of this vast region, which abuts seaward upon the Nile basin is circumscribed almost exclusively by the drainage-basin of the Congo and its affluents. The surface, which covers approximately 900,000 sq. m., is in the main a depressed planular tract, 900-1500 feet in elevation surrounded by lofty highland and mountains (See CONGO). It is the most completely watered of the African regions, and supports over a large part of its area a magnificent and almost impenetrable forest. The chief commercial products are rubber, ivory, copal, palm-kernels, palm oil, and dye-stuffs. Coffee, cacao, and tobacco are successfully cultivated, but not yet sufficiently for export. The value of the rubber export was

In 1909 about $5,000,000 of ivory about $1,000,000. The population, which is variously estimated at from 12,000,000 to 30,000,000, consists chiefly of Bantu tribes (Warus, Manyema, Warenga, etc.) some of whom still practise cannibalistic habits, and of several races of pygmies (Akka, Wambusti, etc.). The European population in Jan 1908, numbered 2268, of whom 1417 were Belgians. Among the chief settlements are Bana and Boma, ports on the lower Congo, Matadi, Vivi, Leopoldville, Kimboko, Bangala, Coquilhatville (formerly Equatorville), Bessyville, and Stanley Falls or Falls Station. The Congo Free State was founded in 1884 under the auspices of the Congo International Association and its status fixed by the concerted action of the Christian powers. It has its central government at Brussels with a governor-general resident at Boma, the official capital of the territory. By a will of Aug. 1899 the King of the Belgians bequeathed to Belgium all his sovereign rights to the State.

Congo, French, a region of west-central Africa, extending on the coast between the German Kamerun territory on the N and Kabinda on the E, and inland to the Congo and Ubangi rivers, and northward to about lat. 18° 30' N. (where it abuts upon the French territory of Ubangi, sometimes unofficially considered a part of the Congo territory) and lat. 10° S (directly S of Lake Chad). It thus comprises a part of the watershed of the Shari River. In its further extension as a military protectorate it reaches Lake Chad and the Bahr el-Ghazal. The physical characteristics of much of the region are those of the Congo Free State, which forms most of its SE boundary having extensive forests watered by numerous streams. Several mountain-ranges extend in the western part in courses more or less parallel with the sea-coast, of which the more prominent are the Sudo Sierra (Sudo de Crystal or Crystal Mountains) with the culminating Mont de Crystal (about 5000 feet). The chief rivers other than the Ubangi and the Congo are the Sangha Likoua (both tributaries of the Congo) and the Ogouai or Ogoni the last having a course of upward of 700 miles and draining an area of about 130,000 sq m. The Gabon an estuary at the mouth of which is situated the capital of the colony Libreville, affords one of the finest harbors on the African coast. The climate is largely equatorial in character but showing great variations of temperature on the sea-border and to the mountains, with the mercury ranging from 60° to 120°. The annual rainfall in places 120-150 inches. The forests contain valuable woods and there is a considerable export of rubber, palm oil, palm kernels, and kola-nuts. Coffee, cacao, and vanilla are largely cultivated. The mineral resources include gold, copper and iron. Telegraph lines are now being laid across the country and a railroad is projected to connect Libreville with the Congo. The chief towns or settlements are Libreville, Loango, Franceville and Brazzaville. The colony is administered by a commissioner-general. The population consisting of negro and other races, is estimated at from 8,000,000 to 13,000,000.

Connecticut, kon-net-ek-ut, a beautiful river the largest in New England, rises in the extreme northern part of New Hampshire, in Coos co. by several branches (one of which is formed in Connecticut Lake) which unite near the NE extremity of Vermont. It runs southward and south-westward and forms the entire boundary between New Hampshire and Vermont. Below the mouth of the White River which is in Windsor co. Vt. its general direction is nearly southward. Having crossed the northern boundary of Massachusetts, it interests the counties of Franklin Hampshire and Hampden in that state, and passes into the state of Connecticut. It runs southward through Hartford co. to Middletown below which it flows southward, until it enters Long Island Sound at Saybrook Point, 36 miles E of New Haven. It is about 400 miles long and drains an area of about 11,000 sq m. Large steamboats around it to Hartford, above which the navigation has been improved by canals around several falls. The Windsor Locks make continuous navigation for smaller vessels to Holyoke. The largest affluents that enter it from the west, or right, are the Passumpsic, White, Deerfield, Westfield and Farmington rivers. From the other side it receives the Ammonoosuc, Miller's, and Chocoma rivers. The chief towns on its banks are Hartford and Middletown in Connecticut, Springfield, Holyoke, and Northampton in Massachusetts and Brattleboro Vermont. The valley of the Connecticut is celebrated for its beauty and fertility. The scenery is diversified by terraces, bluffs, mountains, and broad tracts of level alluvial land. Turner's Falls and Belows Falls mark, among other places, points of interruption in the river's course by falls or rapids. The course of the river is largely through the Triassic red sandstones in which have been found numerous footprints of extinct reptiles and birds.

Connecticut, one of the New England or Eastern states of the American Union, bounded N. by Massachusetts E. by Rhode Island, S. by Long Island Sound (an arm of the Atlantic Ocean) and W. by New York. Its shore-line extends 160 miles from the mouth of the Byram River at the SW. angle of the state, to the mouth of the Pawcatuck River which separates it for some distance from Rhode Island. All the principal islands in the sound belong to New York. Area, 4896 sq. m. of which the land occupies 4845 sq. m. It is the smallest state in the Union except Rhode Island and Delaware.

Face of the Country—Three principal river valleys occupy the greater part of the state's area,—the valley of the Housatonic, with its tributaries the Yantic, Quinebaug, Shennecossett (Willimantic) etc. is the E. part of the Connecticut in the centre and that of the Housatonic (with the Yaugusset, Shaugusset etc.) in the W. The E. portion of the state consists of rounded stony hills affording rich pasturage, with narrow valleys and many well-tilled mill-streams, and the region support a thrifty agricultural and manufacturing population. The Connecticut valley especially near the river and in the parts remote from the sound is exceedingly fertile but its southern portion is to some extent broken and contains some unproductive tracts. In the W. the surface is rough and the hills are often precipitous but the valley lands, though of stony area, have a very generous soil and dairy farming is successfully carried on. The water power of western Connecticut is largely put to use. Some of the higher hills of this region are considered mountains, but deserve that name not so much for their height as for their abrupt character (Bear Mountain 2355 feet, Gridley Mountain, 2200 feet,—both in the town of Salisbury). They are continuous with the Berkshire and Taconic Mountains of Massachusetts and in part, with the Highlands of New York.

Geology and Minerals—The greater part of Connecticut is underlain directly by Azoic rocks of granitic or gneissoid character with abundant mark of glacial action and bearing large drift deposits. In the NW there is a limited area of the Devonian age, and the immediate valley of the Connecticut, except in the lower part in Trumbull. At Portland, opposite Middletown is quarried in great quantities the valuable brownstone, a favorite building material that has had large application especially in the city of New York. Extensive trap dikes occur at many points. Valuable iron ores have long been wrought at Salisbury since 1732. Kent, Roxbury Canaan (Cornwall) Sharon and other places chiefly westward and the metal produced is of the highest grade of excellence. Copper lead, nickel, tungsten, cobalt, and other metals have been obtained at various points, but most of them not in paying quantities. Other mineral and quarry products are lime, marble, cement, flag stone, feldspar, and barium sulphate. There are sulphurous chalybeate and other mineral waters in the state.

Agriculture though by no means a leading industrial pursuit here, is on the whole a fairly remunerative one owing to the proximity of markets and the existence of a large number of manufacturing towns. Fruit hay and dairy-products are the principal staples in the F and W sections. Indian corn rye oats and potatoes are profitable crops in nearly all parts. The product of the different crops was, in 1900, corn, 1,771,000 bushels, wheat, 6364 bushels, oats, 579,000 bushels, rye, 230,800 bushels, buckwheat, 66,300 bushels, potatoes, 2,478,500 bushels and hay 427,400 tons (valued at $7,150,000). Tobacco is extensively grown in the Connecticut valley. There were in the state, in 1900, 418 cigar and tobacco factories, whose combined product was 44,175,000 cigars, 264,670 cigarettes and 23,300 pounds of smoking tobacco. Market-gardening is a profitable occupation near the larger towns and cities.

The manufactures of the state are very extensive. It ranks among the foremost states not only in the amount of capital invested in manufacturing but also in the quantity and value of the products. Important industries are the manufacture of clocks, paper, fire-arms, carriages, automobiles, bicycles, cotton, woolen and silk goods, machinery, gunpowder india-rubber carpets, harness leather furniture, boots and shoes, fish-oil and fertilizers iron hardware, Britannia ware, pins and needles straw goods, hats saddlery, jewelry, and an infinite variety of small wares. Foremost in the line of manufacturing industries is that of the manufacture of brass and brass goods, the product of which in 1900 had a valuation of $40,000,000. Next in rank is that of the manufacture of rubber goods, with a product of $18,944,000. The product of (general) hardware manufactures was valued at $12,600,000 of cottons, about $15,000,000; woollens of all kinds $12,490,000 silk goods $11,650,000; and paper and paper goods $5,502,000.

Counries and Cities—Connecticut has 8 counties,—Hartford, New Haven, New London, Fairfield, Litchfield, Windham, Middlesex, and Tolland. The larger cities are Hartford (the capital) with a population in 1900 of 79,559. New Haven the largest city with 108,027 inhabitants Bridgeport, 70,000 Waterbury 45,859. New Britain 25,195 Meriden 24,299 New London 17,548 Norwich, 17,251 Danbury 10,551 Stamford 15,997, and Ansonia, 12,681.

Railroads, Commerce and Communication—The state is well supplied with railroads, the miles of the main line and its branches being in 1900 1075. The Connecticut River is navigated by steamboats as far as Hartford, and by smaller craft, using the Windsor Lock into Massachusetts; the Thames to Norwich. Steamers run in New York and elsewhere sail regularly at the principal coastal ports, and sailing vessels also carry on a large coasting trade. The old whale and seal fisheries no longer have their former importance. There is a considerable industry in the harvesting and propagation of shell fish especially the oyster. The oyster-grounds under cultivation comprise nearly 64,000 acres.

The principal harbors of the state are those of Stonington, Mystic, New London, Saybrook, New Haven and Bridgeport, and there are others at Naugatuck, Guilford, Clinton, Branford, Milford, Southport, Black Rock, Norwalk, Stamford, Greenwich etc. Bridgeport, New Haven, Hartford, New London and Stenington are ports of entry. Stamford is a subport of entry.

Education—The public school system of Connecticut has a wide reputation. Among the most celebrated institutions of learning are Yale University New Haven founded in 1701, Trinity College, Hartford, Wesleyan University Middletown and the Hartford Theological Seminary. There is a large asylum (school) for the deaf and dumb at Hartford and minor schools of a like character industrial and normal schools, hospitals, etc. are found in the other cities.

Constitution—Up to 1818 there was no state constitution the royal charter of Charles II. granted in 1602 serving to that date as the basis of government. In 1818 the present constitution was adopted. The governor is chosen for a term of two years. The legislature consists of a senate of 24 members, elected for a term of two years, and a house of representatives, whose members (some 220 in number) are chosen from each town for the term of a single year. The state is represented by 5 members in the national congress.

History—The Dutch colonists of New Netherland (New York) in 1633 planted a small settlement on the site of Hartford. Previous to this, in 1631 Lord Say and Sele had obtained a patent for the region in which this was located and, immediately after the advent of the Dutch one Rolme from Plymouth, rallied up the Connecticut men in spite of the opposition of the Dutch set up a trading post upon the site of the present town of Windsor. Windsor itself was colonized by emigrants from Massachusetts in 1634 and in 1635 others from the same colony settled Windsor and Hartford. In 1636 a large immigration to these settlements took place from the towns of Massachusetts. The system of town government which prevailed in Massachusetts was established in the new colony. Saybrook (named for Lord Say and Sele and Lord Brooke) at the mouth of the Connecticut, was settled in 1639. Its existence as a separate colony terminated in 1644 when it was annexed to the Connecticut colony. The Pequot Indians were crushed in 1637. In 1639 the foundations of an independent Puritan colony were laid in the settlement of New Haven. In 1642 a charter providing for autonomous government was granted by Charles II. to the colony of Connecticut, with which the colony of New Haven was incorporated. New Haven rebelled against the disposition that was thus made of it, but was soon forced to submit. In 1687 Sir Edmund Andros, royal governor of New England, demanded from the General Assembly the surrender of the colonial charter in the king's name, but that document was removed and secreted. The old charter of Connecticut insured a local government far more liberal than most others that obtained in New England. In 1770 Connecticut renounced its allegiance to England and was constituted an independent state. In 1818 a new constitution came into operation by which the remnants of the bond of union which had so long subsisted between state and church were finally severed. The legislature was held alternately at New Haven and Hartford until 1874 when Hartford became the sole capital.

Population—In 1776 Connecticut had about 200,000 inhabitants in 1790 237,946 in 1800 251,062 in 1810 261,042 in 1820 275,148 in 1830 297,070 in 1840 309,078 in 1850 370,792 in 1860 480,147 in 1870 537,464 in 1880 622,700 in 1890 745,248 in 1900 908,355 of which number 15,200 were negroes, 499 Chinese, and 103 residential Indians.

Constantine, Lake of (anc. Brigantia Lacus (Ger. Bodensee hu den-zä) a lake of central Europe, forming a common centre in which Switzerland, Baden, Württemberg, Bavaria, and Austria-Hungary meet. Length, from N. W. to S. E. 40 miles greatest breadth about 8 miles area, 207 sq. in greatest depth which is between Friedrichshafen and Utweil 825 feet elevation above sea-level 1305 feet. At its N. W. extremity the lake is divided into two branches or arms, each about 14 miles in length. The N. arm is called the Überlingen Lake, after the town of Überlingen on its N. bank; the S. branch is the L. Intersee, in which is situated the fertile island of Reichenau, belonging to Baden about 3 miles long and 1½ broad. The Rhine enters the lake at Rheineck at its S. E. extremity and leaves it at St. Gallen at its N. W. termination. The lake the waters of which are of a dark green hue and very clear is subject, like most of the larger Swiss lakes to sudden storms. It freezes in severe winters only. Steamers ply on the lake between Constantine and various points on its shores (Hergau, Reichenau, Reichenbach etc.). The banks are not remarkable for picturesque beauty but they are extremely fertile, and are covered with cultivated fields, orchards, and gardens interspersed with ruined castles and with numerous towns and villages, producing a very pleasing and striking effect.

Constantinople, kon-stan-te-no-pli (Turk. Qambul, rikh-böl or istambul modern Ishtambul is-tām-pō-lā-ane. Gr. Kωνσταντινούπολις L. Constantinopolis → c. the city of Constantine') a city of Turkey in Europe capital of the Ottoman Empire, in lat. 41° N. lon. 29° 29' E., situated on a declivity or series of gentle hills, at the E. extremity of a triangular promontory having the Sea of Marmara and the Bosphorus on the S. and E. and the Golden Horn an inlet of the latter on the N. It is thus surrounded by water on all sides except the W. which is walled and has a sea-front altogether about 8 miles in extent. On the opposite side of the Golden Horn and also occupying the extremity of a promontory sometimes called the Peninsula of Pera, are situated the extensive suburbs of Saleta, the mercantile and shipping quarter. Pera, the European quarter and residence of the foreign ambassadors and Tophana, named from its cannon-foundry. On the opposite shore of the Bosphorus stands the important commercial and industrial suburb of Beşiktaş. The city, perhaps more beautifully situated than any other large city of Europe, with the exception of Naples and its appearance from without is extremely picturesque and imposing with its hundreds of mosques on poles and minarets interspersed with lofty cypresses and its port crowded with shipping but within it consists largely of a labyrinth of crooked ill-paved and dirty lanes and a crowd of low built and small houses, built of wood or roughly hewn stone. Of late years following in the course of numerous fires better and more substantial structures have been erected and the general modernizing of the city has removed from it the entirely quaint and Oriental picturesqueness which still belonged to it 30-40 years ago.

The streets are generally dull and deserted, the bustle and animation of life being confined chiefly to the bazaars. The dress of the people has been largely Europeanized and there is now an extensive system of cable and tramways, with gas- and electric-illumination in some parts. The canal service is a thing of the past. A great number of ownerless dogs range the streets, acting as scavengers. The climate is variable and the temperature subject to great changes. The mean temperature of the year is 57.5° Fahr. February about 42° July 74°.

On the extreme N. E. point of the promontory on which the city stands, and on the site of ancient Byzantium is situated the Seraglio, the former private domain of the sultans, in whose enclosing wall was the large and lofty gate known as the Bab-i Humayun the 'high door' or sublime porte (destroyed by fire in 1863) which has given the common diplomatic name for the Ottoman government. Within the precincts of the palace were the celebrated Divan and the harem with the Garden of Delight. A new palace or Seraglio was erected by Abdul-Mejid considerably to the N. of the old one.

The architectural glory of the city and one of the most famous buildings of the world is the mosque of St. Sophia after that of Mecca the principal mosque of the Mohammedan world. It is the finest example of Byzantine style and was originally built as a Christian church by Justinian between 531 and 538, and converted into a mosque by Mohammed II. in 1453. It is in the form of a Greek cross 269 feet in length by 143 feet in breadth and is surmounted by a flattened dome 160 feet in height above the ground besides several minor cupolas and 4 minarets. Its walls are brick, but the interior is lined with costly marbles and adorned with ancient Byzantine paintings and decorations the temples of Delos, Baalbek, and Athens having been plundered to add to its splendour. It was restored by Fossati in 1847-1849. Among the principal mosques may be noted those of Achmet, of Selim and the Magnificent of Mohammed II. of Bajazet, and the Velde mosque, built by the mother of Mohammed IV. Most of the greater mosques have colleges and almost all have charitable institutions, named imarets, attached to them which latter serve at once as poor houses and hospitals.

The educational development of Constantinople is associated primarily with its three classes of public schools:

primary district schools for boys and girls, in which the pupils are taught to read, write, and cipher, and to recite the Koran. provincial schools of a higher order, for boys only, and the mosque colleges, or Medreses, for the study of theology and law. In 1807 a lyceum for the higher education was established by Sultan Abdul-Aziz and in 1809 a new university, with faculties in theology, mathematical and natural science, philosophy, civil law and medicine, came into active existence, succeeding the university faculty which had previously been established in association with the lyceum or constituted as district schools (medical school etc.) The number of professors is still limited. Besides these there are special government schools, including the military, naval, and artillery schools, the school of engineering, etc. The Greeks maintain a so-called Great National School dating from the Middle Ages. Constantinople now possesses numerous libraries, several museums and scientific and art institutions (museum of antiquities in the garden of the old Seraglio, Bazaar Archaeological Institute opened in 1860, Pasteur Institute founded in 1895 and the Ottoman art school). The city has a so-called Greek theological seminary. The Literary Greek Society is the most important learned body in the Greek Orient. In the vicinity is Robert College, an excellent institution under American management.

The bazaars for the sale of wares are extensive and well supplied, but with no particular architectural adornment. Among the chief ornaments of the city are its cemeteries. Its antiquities comprise, besides columns, pillars etc., various subterranean caverns and the aqueduct of Valens.

The city proper comprises several quarters — those for the Jews, Armenians and Greeks. The Greek quarter the Phanar extends along the shore of the port or the Golden Horn. This fine harbor extends for about 4½ miles inland in a northwesterly direction, varying in breadth from about ½ to 1 mile. Wharves of the largest class and safe anchorages here and there are large groves and dry docks. The port, with its busy naval life, is at all times an attractive scene adjacent to the city. The trade of Constantinople is carried on chiefly by foreigners. The city exports silk and cocoons, carpets and rugs, lambkins, wool, goat hair, attar of roses, yellow berries, blouses-work, madder, opium, valonia etc. Manufacturing is carried on mostly on a small scale. Railways unite Constantinople with Adrianople and Belgrade, and since 1895 there is through railway service from Paris. Constantinople is the see of Greek, Armenian and Latin patriarchs, the last-named non resident. The Greek patriarch is the head of the Greek Church in the Ottoman Empire.

The fortifications of the city were extended and reconstructed in 1878, after the war with Russia.

Constantinople is the ancient Byzantium, one of the most flourishing cities in the eastern part of the Greek world, founded as a Dorian colony in the seventh century B.C. In A.D. 330 Byzantium was selected as the capital of the Roman Empire by Constantine the Great, who rebuilt it, renaming it Constantinople. For more than a thousand years from A.D. 330 Constantinople was the capital of the Byzantine, Greek or Eastern Empire. The city played a leading part in the history of Christianity, the Patriarch of Constantinople ranking in the position of head of the Christian Church in the East. No city in the world has stood so many sieges. In 1203 and again in 1261 it was taken by the Venetians and Crusaders and in 1453 by Mohammed II, who made it the capital of the Ottoman Empire. The population (including suburbs) is estimated at about 1,250,000 comprising Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Frank Jews, and others.

Copenhagen, peh-nah-gheh (Dan. A. behov kyō hee böwn — a marbolska havn Gor Apen-Angon, ko-pen hā ghen Fr. Copenhagen ko-pen hā Hoffstad) the capital of Denmark is situated on the Sound, chiefly on the E. coast of Seeland but partly on the island of Amager which is separated from Seeland by a narrow arm of the Sound which forms a harbor and once spacious, deep and secure. Lat. (observatory) 55° 41' 12" N. lon. 12° 34' 41" E. Copenhagen occupies a flat so low as to require to be protected by embankments against the Baltic. The part of the city which is on the island of Amager a modern quarter bears the name of Christianshavn. It is so surrounded by water as almost to constitute a little island in itself. The successive suburbs of Copenhagen were formerly separated from the city by the old fortifications. These have been levelled and converted into promenades. A modern system of fortifications on a grand scale, recently constructed beyond the site of the old ones and embracing canals for flooding the approaches to the city has converted Copenhagen into a great stronghold. The old citadel of Frederik has still remains in the NE part of the city but is no longer available for military purposes. Though Copenhagen is an ancient town its consequences of repeated conflagrations the greater part of its old wooden houses have been replaced by lofty and well-built modern buildings of brick or Norwegian granite and in architectural character it yields in few European capitals. A portion of the old town is cut off by artificial waterways so as to form a renaissance island called Slotsholmen or Castle Island, on which is an imposing array of public edifices. These include the buildings pertaining to the famous royal palace of Christiansburg the main structure of which was destroyed by fire in 1884 the building of the ministries, the royal library, the Thorwaldsen Museum with a façade in the style of the Etruscan sepulchral structures, the arsenal and the exchange erected early in the seventeenth century. The principal of the public squares is the Kongens Nytorv (the New King's Market) which constitutes the centre of the city as fewer than 12 streets opening into it. In its centre is a colossal statue of Christies. On this square are the old royal palace of Charlottenborg now converted into an academy of fine arts and the new national theatre. In front of the former stands the equestrian statue of Frederick VII. and in front of the latter are the statues of the great national writers, Holberg and Oehlenschläger. About a third of a mile to the N.E. of the Kongens Nytorv is the octagonal Amalienburg Square, on which are 4 stately palaces, one used for the royal residence. In the centre of the city is the principal church the Frue Kirke or Church of Our Lady adorned with sculptures by Thorvaldsen. Close to it are the university buildings, the university library and the zoological garden. Further N are the extensive botanical gardens. Within these grounds or near by are the observatory with a station of Lybke Brahe, the new buildings of the polytechnic institute, mineralogical museum and chemical laboratory and the art museum. Adjoining are the botanical gardens and the fine old royal palace and park of Rosenborg. The palace is now a museum of regalia, arranged in the chronological order of the Danish sovereigns. Among the prominent churches in addition to the Frue Kirke, are St. Peter's, the German church, Trinity church, the great round tower of which was formerly an observatory and the Church of Our Saviour. The pleasure grounds and park in promenade of the city are on a scale commensurate with its architectural beauties and the wealth of its sculptural monuments. In the western quarter is Ørsted Park, with a statue of the great physicist.

Copenhagen is the chief centre of Scandinavian literature, science, and art. The national university founded in 1478 has, together with the polytechnic institute, over 2000 students. Its library contains about 300,000 volumes. The royal library contains 650,000 volumes and 20,000 MSS. It is particularly rich in Northern literature, and among the MSS is Rask's unique Sanskrit and Singhalese collection. The museum of Northern antiquities and the ethnographic museum, both forming part of the new national museum established in 1892, are unrivalled of their kind. Thorvaldsen's museum consists of works by that great sculptor and others bequeathed by him to the nation. It comprises also the mannequin in which he is buried. Among other valuable collections is the royal gallery of paintings.

The harbor of Copenhagen forms the great naval station of Denmark being capable of enclosing the whole fleet. One portion in the extreme N has recently been set off for a free port, and here extensive warehouses have been erected. Among the leading manufacturing establishments of Copenhagen are its porcelain works, which enjoy a European reputation. Ship-building is extensively carried on and there are machine-shops, textile-factories, chemical works, sugar refineries, etc. The city carries on an active commerce by water and land.

Copenhagen is first mentioned as a fishing hamlet, in 1043. In 1468 Bishop Absalon founded a haven and erected a fort on the Slotsholmen as a place of refuge from the Northern pirates. The place then bore the name of Axelhus. Shortly afterwards it rose to importance and acquired its present name of Kjøbenhavn or Merchant's Haven. The Danish fleet was defeated here by Nelson in 1801. In 1807 the town was bombarded by the British who carried off the Danish fleet. Pop. in 1890 312,387, in 1901 378,233.

Corinth (anc. L. Corinthis or Korinthos) an ancient city of Greece, at the SW end of the Isthmus of Corinth between the Gulf of Corinth (Lepanto) on the W and that of Argos on the E., 48 miles W of Athens. It was situated under the northern slope of a steep mountain 1886 feet high, on which was the citadel, the Acro-Corinthus, and on whose side was the famed fountain of Pirene. It is supposed to have been founded by the Phoenicians. It was one of the most flourishing cities of Greece, being an entrepôt for all merchandise passing from sea to sea across the isthmus, and commanding at the same time all the land traffic from N to S. Its inhabitants, who excelled in weaving dyeing metal working, and the ceramic arts, founded numerous colonies and acquired great riches, so that Corinth became proverbial for its luxury. It was profusely adorned with fountains, statues, theatres and public buildings of such excellence in design as to give rise to an order of architecture now known by its name. An ancient Corinth was sacked and nearly destroyed by the Romans 146 B.C.; nearly all the treasures of art there accumulated were carried to Rome. A new city arose under the Romans. Of the ancient structures hardly a vestige remains. In the Middle Ages Corinth passed into the hands of the Venetians, from whom it was wrested by Mohammed II. Until recent times the Acro-Corinthus was a strong fortress. The town was destroyed by an earthquake in 1688. The present town called New Corinth the capital of the newly constituted nevo of Corinthia, lies 3 miles NE of the site of the old city on the Gulf of Corinth. Pop. in 1896, 4188. Cornwall, a county of England forming its SW extremity enclosed by the sea on all sides except on the E. where it is separated in great part from Devonshire by the river Tamar. Area, 1965 sq. m. including the Scilly Islands. The surface is intersected from W. to E. by a ridge of rugged and bleak hills, and very scantily timbered, but it has some very picturesque and fertile valleys. On the northern coast a considerable extent of surface has been overwhelmed with sand, covering hills of several hundred feet in height. The shores are greatly indented by inlets of these, the principal of which are St. Ives and Padstow harbors on the Atlantic Ocean and on the English Channel St. Blasay Bay, Falmouth Harbor and Mounta Bay, between the promontories of the Lizard and Land's End. Plymouth Sound, on the borders of Devon is the estuary of the Tamar. Principal rivers are the Tamar, Fowey and Camel. Wheat, barley and oats are the chief crops, and agriculture has lately improved. The pilchard herring and mackerel fisheries are actively carried on. Cornwall is rich in metals its tin-mines have been wrought from remote antiquity. The great metallic district extends from Dartmoor in Devonshire on the E. to Land's End on the W. Copper, silver, lead, zinc, iron, manganese, antimony, arsenic, magnesia, cobalt, and hematite are also found but mining is mainly confined to tin. The principal towns are Bodmin (the capital), Truro, Launceston, Falmouth, Penryn and Penzance. This part of Britain was not subdued by the Saxons till the time of Athelstan, and its vernacular language (the Cornish, a dialect of the Celtic) became extinct about 1800. The district contains many Druidical stones and other rude monuments, as also ruins of baronial castles. The eldest son of the king of England bears the title of duke of Cornwall. Pop. in 1881 330,686. In 1891 328,589. In 1901 322,334. The county as such returns 6 members to parliament.

Corse, kor'-ee (anc. Cyros afterwards Corseira Fr. Cors kone) an island of a somewhat irregular but compact shape in the Mediterranean situated between lat 41° 20' and 43° N and lon 6° 30' and 9° 30' E separated on the S from Sardinia by the Strait of Bonifacio 7 miles wide in its narrowest part. Greatest length from N to S 110 miles greatest breadth 53 miles Area 3366 sq m. In the N it runs out into a long and narrow point of land, about 23 miles long, pointing like an index finger in the direction of Genoa, and terminating in Cape Corse. The E coast is remarkable for its uniformity but the W coast presents a striking contrast, a number of deep bays following one another in rapid succession. Of these, the most important, proceeding from N to S are the Gulfs of Santo Fiorenzo, Calvi Porto Sagone, Ajaccio and Ajaccio. The interior is covered with mountains the culminant point, Monte Cinto, in the NW having a height of 8889 feet, with Monte Rotondo not far N of the centre of the island rising to an almost equal elevation (8619 feet). For the greater part of the year the loftier summits are covered with snow. Numerous streams, or rather torrents descend precipitously on all sides to the coast. The climate is noted for its salubrity the E coast, however being an exception. The heat is sometimes oppressive but the sky is generally clear and the air bracing. Owing to the mountainous nature of the surface, much of it still remains in a state of nature. The magnificent primeval forests are, however being gradually reduced in extent. Forests of stately chestnuts yielding immense quantities of nuts, abound to great elevations. Nowhere does the olive grow more luxuriantly than in Corsica. The vegetation of the southern Mediterranean zone is well represented in the island.

Above the forest-level are the Alpine pastures, upon which browse multitudes of sheep and goats. The principal agricultural products are grain (mainly wheat), potatoes, oil, wine, and southern fruits (especially lemons). Agriculture is in a very backward state, and in many parts chestnuts are an important staple of food. Timber is largely exported. Fish is abundant in the lagoons along the E. coast. Large quantities of eels, anchovies, and tunny fishes are caught. The coral fishery is also carried on. Lead, copper and antimony are mined in small quantities. The mineral products include granite, porphyry, Jasper, serpentine, marble, and alabaster. Although the island has been ceded to France for more than a century the population is still almost entirely Italian. The Corsicans are a simple for the most part ignorant, sturdy and unspoiled rustic folk fond of poetry and clinging to the practices of the past. The vendetta (assassination in connection with hereditary family feuds) has not entirely died out. Manufactures are hardly developed. The chief ports of Corsica are Bastia, Ajaccio and Calvi. The island forms one of the departments of France. Capital Ajaccio. Pop. in 1901 285,589.

The Carthaginians held sway on the coasts of Corsica, and in the second half of the third century a. c. were forced to cede the island to the Romans. In the early part of the Middle Ages the Vandals, Goths, Saracens and Lombards successively descended upon the island. For a while it was ceded to the French realm. It was long a bone of contention between the Pisans and Genoa, the latter remaining masters of it at the close of the thirteenth century. It revolted in the first half of the eighteenth century and in 1768 it was sold by Genoa to France. An insurrection which broke out in 1794 under the lead of Pasquale liberated the island for a brief space but French authority was re-established in 1804. Napoleon was a native of Corsica.

Costa Rica, kos'ta ree ka (i.e. rich coast) the most southern republic of Central America, bounded NW by Nicaragua, from which it is partly separated by the river San Juan, NE by the Caribbean Sea, SE by Panama, and S and W by the Pacific Ocean between lat. 8° (Punta Rerion) and 11° 13' N lon 82° 54' and 85° 55' W Area, about 23,000 sq m. The Pacific coast is indented by the two large gulfs of Nicoya and Dulce. The country which is separated by a narrow strip of land from Lake Nicaragua is traversed from SE to NW by the Sierra Talamancas and its continuation which near Cartago is divided by the depression known as the Lolo Ochomopo from which streams (Reventazon Tiroles) flow in opposite directions to the Atlantic and the Pacific basins. These mountains are constructed of very ancient granite and igneous rocks and attain elevations of 10,000 to 11,000 feet or even more. They are flanked by Cretaceous and Tertiary strata, which rise up in mountain ridges subordinate to the main chain. The latter carries a number of volcanoes, both active and extinct or dormant, including those of Irazu (5200 ft.) Rinco de la Vieja, Miravalles, Tenorio, Irazu (8600 ft.) Barba Turrialba (10,900 ft.) and Irazu the highest (11,200 ft.) whose summit commands a view of both oceans. Land or the volcano of Cartago is freely active and it has given rise to several destructive seismic disturbances. Earthquakes are frequent and the town of Cartago has suffered complete or extensive destruction four times during the past century—in 1803, 1841, 1851, and 1854. Along the coast of the Pacific especially around the Bay of Nicoya, the country has a beautiful and picturesque appearance, being diversified by valleys and intersected by numerous streams. Costa Rica contains some rich gold-mines which are still worked. Silver and copper with zinc, nickel, iron, lead, mercury and coal, are also found here. In all parts of the republic, with the exception of the sea-coast the climate is mild and temperate or subject to excessive heat or cold, and rarely experiencing any other vicissitudes than those from the dry to the rainy season. It is therefore extremely well adapted to agricultural purposes, and capable of bringing to maturity many European plants as well as most of those peculiar to the tropics. At San José, at an elevation of about 3700 ft. there is a perpetual spring with a mean annual temperature of 68°, the temperature of December being 63° and of May 60°. The rainfall is in places, very abundant and much more on the Atlantic than on the Pacific side ranging as high as 140 inches (Port Limón). Heavy and luxuriant forest covers a large part of the country extending far up on the mountain slopes and includes among its vegetable forms the mahogany, ebony, india-rubber, Brazil-wood, native cedar oak (at elevations of 6000 ft. and over) myrtle, etc. The soil is remarkably fertile, especially on the table-lands and in the valleys between the mountains. Among the agricultural productions are coffee, bananas, cacao, Indian corn, tobacco, sugar and wheat, the first two being the most important. In 1890 33,800,000 pounds of coffee, with a valuation of nearly $3,000,000, and 2,980,000 bunches of bananas valued at $1,200,000 were exported. The export of coffee in 1901 was 36,000,000 pounds, and of bananas nearly 3,000,000 bunches. The other exports are gold, hides, skins, cacao, dye-woods, sugar, etc. There is considerable pearl fishing in the Gulf of Nicoya. The two ports of entry are Puntas Arenas, in the Gulf of Nicoya, and Port (or Puerto) Limón on the Caribbean Sea, the latter being connected by rail with San José and Alajuela (117 miles).

The government of Costa Rica is liberal and is vested in a chief executive, the president of the republic (who is assisted by a cabinet of 4 ministers) and a national legislative body or house of representatives, 1 representative in which is contributed by every 8000 inhabitants. The religion is Roman Catholic. Costa Rica is divided into 5 provinces and 2 districts. Capital, San José. Pop. estimated (1902) 317,000. Costa Rica formed part of the short-lived republic of the United States of Central America (1823-38) which was established at the time of the liberation of Mexico from Spanish rule. Its independence was hardly said to have been fully established until 1848.

Cracow, or Krakow, krák kó (Pol. Kraków krák kóv. Her Krakau krák kóv. L. Cracovia) a city of Austria-Hungary in Galicia, formerly capital of the kingdom of Poland situated in a broad plain on the left bank of the Vistula, 138 miles SE of Warsaw. Lat. 50° 4' N, lon. 19° 52' E. It consists of the old town the walls of which have been converted into promenades, of the castle quarter to the S, and of a number of suburbs. On the opposite bank of the river is the suburb of Podgórze. The Kazimierz quarter is inhabited mainly by Jews. Cracow with its numerous steep streets and towers, presents externally a highly picturesque appearance. The splendid castles or palaces towering upon the banks of the Vistula, was for centuries the residence of the Polish kings. It was converted in the last century into barracks and a hospital. The grand old Gothic cathedral adjoining the castle, contains the tomb of a long line of Polish kings and of some of the most distinguished nobles of Poland. Its numerous chapels and crypts contain a large array of beautiful sculptural monuments including some by Thorwaldsen. Among the multitude of churches are a number of interesting medieval edifices adorned with excellent works of art. The central public square is the Ring Square, on which stands the Cloth Hall, a quaint old building, recently restored. It contains the National (Polish) Museum. Close to it is the tower of the old town-hall. Another noteworthy structure is the new episcopal palace. In the western part of the city are the stately new buildings of the university. The university of Cracow (the so-called Jagellon University) boasts of being older than any of the universities in central Europe, with the exception of that of Prague, it having been projected in 1264 by Casimir the Great. In the sixteenth century it was one of the chief centres of learning in Europe. Its students number about 1700 and instruction is given in the Polish language. It has a library of 350,000 volumes and connected with it are a botanical garden and an observatory. The Royal Academy of Sciences is an institution of a high order. The Czartoryski Museum contains a library of about 100,000 volumes and about 5000 MSS and various collections. Cracow has recently been reconverted into a fortress by the construction of outlying forts. The town has manufactures of machinery, agricultural implements, chemicals, tobacco, etc. Close to the city is a museum more than 700 feet high built up nearly a century ago to commemorate the patriotic deeds of Kosciuszko. Another artificial tumulus preserves the memory of Krakus, a legendary Slavic chief who is reputed to have founded the city about the year 700. Cracow was the capital of the kingdom of Poland down to the beginning of the seventeenth century, when the seat of government was transferred to Warsaw and for 100 years longer it remained the coronation-city. From 1815 to 1846 it was the capital of the Little Republic of Cracow, the last fragment of an independent Poland. The city is a great stronghold and focus of the Polish nationality. Pop. in 1900 31,823.

Crete, krete or Candia, kan dá-4 (anc. L. Crete Gr. Kreta, mod. Gr. Krita krete Turk. Aird ke-reed) a large island of the Mediterranean previous to 1898 constituting a viloyet of Turkey between lat 34° 04' and 35° 43' N and lon 23° 30' and 24° 20' E. Length 156 miles, breadth from 6 to 35 mi. Area, together with that of some small islands, 3127 sq. mi. The coasts are generally precipitous. The N coast is deeply indented among the bays or gñs being those of Canes or Khania, Suda, Malimo (Rethymon) Arnyro and Mirabell. The S coast is broken by small indentations the only large bay being that of Messara. Among the espes are those of Bura and Spada (Spatha) near the NW extremity of the island Cape Sidero at the NE and Cape Lithorio (or Matsaba) the most southerly point. The surface is very mountainous. Among the few plains are those of Canes and Candia is the N and Messara in the S. In the W are the White mountains (Madara) the loftiest in the island, attaining in Mount Theodoros an elevation of 8100 feet. In the centre is the group of mountains constituting in Mount Ida (Palorid) 8000 ft. The Lanthi mountains in the E rise to a height of about 7000 ft. above the sea. The streams of Crete are merely torrents. There are numerous caverns.

The climate is, in general mild and healthy, the heats of summer being tempered by a N wind which blows throughout the greater part of the day. Occasionally a fierce onrush causes the mercury to rise to 100°. The only useful minerals known to exist are gypsum, lime, sate, and whetstone. Vegetation is extremely luxuriant in favorable situations, although a great portion of the soil is dry and stony and not well adapted for the production of grain. In many places however fruits and vegetables grow spontaneously, myrtles and rose-lavels cover the banks of the rivulets, and pastures are encumbered with the most beautiful and fragrant flowers. There are large olive woods, but the extent of forests is small. The principal products are olive oil tobacco oranges, lemons, silk wine, raisins, curries, valonia, flax liquorice, wool, cotton and honey. The manufactures are mostly domestic. The leading articles of export include olive oil soap, carobs, raisins, wine, and almonds. The principal port is Khania. The population of Crete in 1900 was 300,849. The great bulk of the inhabitants belong to the Greek church, about 10 per cent. being Mohammedans. Almost the entire population including the Mohammedans, is of Greek race. There are now hardly any Turks left in the island. The old Greek stock is supposed to be best preserved among the Sphakiotas in the White mountains. Crete is an autonomous state, under Turkish suzerainty governed by a high-commissioner of the Great Powers. There is a national assembly or chamber. The capital is Candia (Mega skastro).

In the time of Homer Crete was crowded with inhabitants and contained a great number of flourishing cities. Among the cities founded by the Dorian Greeks were Cnossus, in the N. Cydonia, in the NW and Gortyna, in the S. The Romans became masters of the island about 67 B.C. When the Latin Crusaders passed upon the Greek Empire, in 1204, Crete passed into the possession of Venice. The Turks wrested it from the Venetians, completing their conquest in 1669. There was a great rising of the Christians against the Turks in 1866-68. Another insurrection broke out in 1896 and in 1898 the Great Powers forced Turkey to evacuate the island.

Crimea, kria-ee a (Krim, Arme and Taurica Chersonesus) a peninsula of Russia projecting into the Black Sea, forming the SW end of the Sea of Azov and comprising part of the government of Taurida. It is traversed by the parallel of 45° N lat. Area, about 9900 sq. in. The narrow isthmus of Perekop connects it with the mainland to the N. The Strait of Yenikale or Kerch cuts it off from the mainland on the E. On the NE is the shallow inlet of the Sea of Azov known as the Sivash (or Petrid) Sea. The Crimea is separated into two distinct regions by its largest river the Salghir. The NW portion which is much the larger of the two regions, is an extensive plain a continuation of the steppe of south Russia, and its soil is very fertile with salt, is only fit for pasturage, great herds of cattle being reared upon it. The SE portion is a great part hilly and mountainous, and is interspersed with beautiful meadows and fertile valleys. The Tauric Mountains skirt the SE coast, attaining an elevation of 5000 feet. One of the highest peaks is the Tektir Dag or Tent Mountain (an Trapesus). The climate of the level plains of the Crimea is cold and humid in winter and hot and dry in summer. The SE coast is protected against the north winds by its steep mountain barrier, enjoys a mild winter and spring climate. This stretch of sunny coast, with its vineyards, olive plantations, gardens, and villas its background of forested mountains, with the laurels, cypresses, and fig trees growing at their bases, its profusion of resplendent flowering plants and its relics of ancient etruscan and Mohammedan architecture, is the rival of the Italian Riviera. Here is situated the famous imperial seat of Livadia. The leading agricultural products of the Crimea are grain, tobacco wine and fruits. Its honey is celebrated. There are numerous small salt lakes, from which large quantities of salt are obtained. In addition to the Russians, who constitute the bulk of the population, the inhabitants include Tartars (of whom there are a great number) Greeks, Germans, Bulgarians, and Jews (the Karaites not being here represented). The chief towns are Sebastopol, Simferopol, Kerch, Feodosia (Kaffa), Eupatoria (Koslov), Yalta, Karsakhar and Baktchisarai the old residence of the Tartar khans. The Crimea was known to the ancient Greeks as the Tauric Chersonesus, or the peninsula of the Tauri, a barbarous race. The Greek kingdom of the Bosphorus existed here for centuries. In the thirteenth century the Tartars overran the region. The Genoese planted colonies on the coasts of the Crimea, the most flourishing of which was Kaffa. This great outpouring of the trade between Europe and Asia fell in 1475 into the hands of the Turks who at this time made the Tartar khans of the Crimea vassals of the Sultan. The Turks had to relinquish their suzerainty in 1774, and in 1783 the peninsula was annexed to Russia. The Crimea was the principal seat of the conflict known as the Crimean or Eastern War in which Turkey, England, France, and Sardinia were arrayed against Russia, and the crowning episode of which was the capture of Sebastopol by the allies in 1855.

Ger Kroatien, kro-âi se-qn) a region in Austria-Hungary constituting the western half of the Hungarian crown-land of Croatia-Slavonia. (See CROATIA-SLAVONIA.) It extends northeastward from the Adriatic to the river Drava and is bounded W. and NW. by Istria, Carniola, and Styria, NE. by Hungary E. by Slavonia, SE. by Turkish Croatia, and S. by Dalmatia. It is mainly a mountainous or hilly country. Its inhabitants are chiefly Croats, a Slavic people, who belong to the Catholic church. Their language is almost identical with that of the Serbs. They exhibit a strong national feeling and are restless under Hungarian domination. The chief town is Agram. The Croats settled in this region in the seventh century. In the tenth century their state rose to the rank of a kingdom but they were unable to maintain their independence long in the face of the power of Hungary. In 1848, under their famous hero Jellachich they rose in arms against the Hungarians and, after the loss of the Hungarian revolution, Croatia (together with Slavonia) was separated from Hungary down to the reorganization of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy in 1867.

Turkiss Croatia, or the KRAISIA is the northwesternmost portion of Bosnia.

Croatia-Slavonia, a crown-land of Austria-Hungary with the title of king included in Transleithania. Though attached to the Hungarian kingdom and represented in its diet it has a diet of its own with powers to regulate local affairs. It is bounded on the NW. by Carniola and Styria, on the NE. and E. by Hungary from which it is separated by the Drava and Danube, on the S. by Serbia, Bosnia, and Dalmatia (the Save forming a great part of the S. boundary) and SW. and W. by the Adriatic Sea and Istria. It consists of Croatia, the larger half, in the W. and Slavonia, a wedge-shaped territory included between the Drava, the Danube, and the Save, to the E. Area, 15,420 sq. m. Croatia-Slavonia is mainly a mountainous and hilly country. Slavonia is traversed by wooded foothills of the southwestern Alps, whose greatest elevation is about 4000 feet above the sea. Along the Drava and Save are level plains. The southern part of Croatia includes a portion of the Cretaceous Alpine highlands known as the Karst, remarkable for the peculiar configuration of their deep-cut valleys and their subterranean water-courses. The Croatian Karst presents the two mountain ranges called the Velebit Planina and the Capela. The former, near the coast, attains an elevation of about 5700 feet. A wintry blast called the bora frequently sweeps down from the Karst and bursts upon the coast land with the violence of a hurricane. The country is, in general, a fertile region as well in the mountainous parts of Croatia as in the plains of Slavonia. The staple crops include wheat, maize, pulses, potatoes, flax, hemp, tobacco, etc. Much wine is produced and the plum brandy called Slibovitz, is made in large quantities. Timber is an important product. Large numbers of cattle, horses, sheep, and swine are reared. The half-bred belag fattened in the oak forests of Slavonia. The pop. at the close of 1900 was 2,416,304. Nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Croats and Serbs. About five per cent. are Germans and a still smaller number Hungarians. About three-fourths of the people are Roman Catholics, the remainder belonging mainly to the Greek Church. The inhabitants of Croatia-Slavonia are for the most part an agricultural people. Among the manufacturing industries carried on in a small way is the production of cotton and silk fabrics of exquisite texture. The capital is Agram. The governor of Croatia-Slavonia bears the title of ban.

Cronstadt, or Kronstadt, Kr u stätt a seaport town of Russia, government and 20 miles W of St. Petersburg at the SE end of the long, flat island of Kotlin in the Bay of Cronstadt, which forms the E extremity of the Gulf of Finland. It is the principal fortress and military port of Russia and the station of the Baltic fleet. Its defenses effectually close off approach from the sea to the capital. On the E side of Kotlin is the narrow channel which large sea-going vessels have to take in coming up to the capital. All approach to the town are barred by forts and batteries of the strongest description. The harbor consists of three sections, the military or outer harbor, the middle harbor for the fitting out and repairing of vessels, and the innermost harbor used only by merchant-vessels. Until recently vessels of large draught, bringing cargoes to St. Petersburg were obliged to discharge at Cronstadt, but there is now a deep artificial channel which enables such ships to reach the capital. Much of the external commerce of Russia however still passes through Cronstadt. Ice blocks up the harbor five months in the year. When the surface has become firmly frozen over cargoes are transported over the ice in sleds, an avenue being marked out by lines of poles and signal fires. Cronstadt has a large number of establishments and institutions of every kind connected with the naval service, including an arsenal, barracks, large ship-yards and a repairing docks school of marine engineering etc. It has several handsome buildings a park and some fine public monuments. Cuba, kü bá (Sp. prua koo'ah) the largest of the West India Islands until 1898 a possession of Spain and now an independent republic is situated at the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico, 130 miles S of Florida (90 miles from Key West) from which it is separated by Florida Strait. On the E it is separated from Haiti by the Windward Passage 48 miles wide, on the S from Jamaica, by a portion of the Caribbean Sea, 90 miles across, and on the W from Yucatan by the Yucatan Channel 130 miles wide. It measures 730 miles in length along its axial line from E to W and varies in width from about 60 miles in the eastern part to less than 20 miles on the meridian of longitude a short distance W of Havana. The extreme E end of the island (Apr. 1901) is in lat. 74° 7' W. or almost due south of the city of New York. The W end, Cape San Antonio, is lat. 84° 57' W. (a little westward of the meridian of Cincinnati) and the island extends from lat. 10° 48' north to lat. 23° 13' N. Area, inclusive of the Isle of Pines and the very numerous keys about 43,500 sq. m.

The coast-line with its main indentations, measures upward of 2000 miles in length and for most of the island's contour is abrupt and precipitous. On the E. it presents a series of superimposed terraces rising to 500 feet or more and representing in many places in the elevation of the land out of the sea. The coasts are in general exceedingly foul, preventing reefs and shallows which extend from 2 to 24 miles into the sea and make the approach both difficult and dangerous. Within these reefs there is often a good sandy beach, but for a large part of the circumference of the island there is a belt or zone of lowland very little raised above the level of the sea, subject to floods and inundations, rendering communication between the interior and the sea difficult in the rainy season. There are, however, good harbors and bays on all the coasts including Havana, one of the finest harbors in the West Indies.

Cuautlan, Santiago de Cuba, Manzanillo, and Bahía de Jagua or Xagua (Cienfuegos) on the S coast, Bahía Honda and Cabañas on the NW coast and Baracoa, Nipe, Cabaiguán, Páez, Mororan, Cardenas, Matanzas, etc. on the N and NE coasts.

The greater part of the island is traversed by mountain ranges of more or less continuity whose trend conforms in great measure to the usual axis or the immediate coast. Among the better known of these mountains are the Sierra de los Organos (Organ Mountains) in the W extending through the province of Pinar del Rio to the neighborhood of Havana, with the Pan de Azúcar 2830 feet in elevation, the Sierra Cubitas and the Sierra Maestra, which dominates the coast of the province of Santiago and culminates in the precipitous Pico Turquino, about 8400 ft. in height, the loftiest summit of the island. Other well known peaks are the Gran Piedra, about 5200 ft. and the Cerro de Oro, 3200 ft. The eastern section of the Maestra chain which has its continuation in the mountains of the northern peninsula of Haiti, is known as the Sierra del Cobre or Copper Mountains named from the deposits of this metal which it contains. A prominent topographic feature is the Anvil (Yunque) of Baracoa, 1820 ft in height. Towards the middle of the island the mountains drop down to undulating knolls or even entirely disappear the line of the historic trocha being a low marshy depression about 45 mi. in width, which connects Morón on the N with the S coast. The dominant Cuban mountains are constructed of Jurassic Cretaceous and Tertiary sandstones, conglomerates, and Miocenes with vast volcanic and dioritic intrusions and are flanked in part by Miocene and more recent homochs, some of them recent coral reefs. Nuclear granitic rocks are present in many parts.

There are no very large rivers in Cuba, the largest being the Cauto, which discharges into the Matanzas bight and has a length of some 260 miles, about one-half of which is navigable for small craft. The Saco, the Matanzas, which drains the large swamps (cafayagua) lying N of the Zapata peninsula, and the Sagua is (grande a stream of the N coast, discharging in Jan 80 W.

Climate and Productions.—The climate of Cuba is essentially tropical hot and dry during the greater part of the year. The mean temperature of the lowland ranges from about 77° (Havana) to 82.5° (Santiago de Cuba) in the interior highlands the temperature is considerably lower. The hottest months July and August (or September) do not give a greater average than 83° and the coldest, December and January present the mean of 72°. In summer the thermometer seldom rises above 86° and in winter rarely falls so low as 50°. Rain often descends in torrents from July to September and occasional showers fall for a month or two before and after these periods. The annual rainfall varies, according to the situation from 40 to nearly 160 inches. No snow is known ever to fall on the lowland. The vegetation of Cuba is exceedingly luxuriant. Forests of mahogany abound cedar, ficus and other useful woods abound and the fields are covered with flowers and odoriferous plants. The royal palm is a magnificent type of Cuban vegetation. The principal cereal cultivated is Indian corn. Rice is also produced in considerable quantities and there is some cultivation of cotton, cacao and indigo but the principal crops which figure in commerce are sugar tobacco, and coffee. A considerable extent of country is appropriated to cattle-breeding, and to farms on which are raised vegetables, maize, melochia grass, casava, onions, garlic, poultry, wax and honey. The principal fruits of the island are oranges, pineapples, shaddock, plantains, bananas, melons, lemons and sweet lime, figs and strawberries are also to be had. The valleys of Cuba are famed for their beauty and fertility and are exquisitely lovely in their scenic surroundings. Of these probably none surpasses the Yumuri, watered by a stream of the same name which discharges into Matanzas Bay. The quantity of sugar produced in Cuba in the years 1897-1900 was about 300,000 tons annually but in the year 1894-95 the product had reached 1,004,000 tons. In 1901 the production was 600,000 tons, and in 1902 850,000 tons. The bulk of the sugar exports goes to the United States, the value of the shipments thither in 1901 having exceeded $30,000,000. The unsettled condition of the country has naturally affected the agricultural as well as all other industries. About 47 per cent. of the entire cultivated area of the island is planted in sugar-cane, chiefly in the provinces of Santa Clara and Matanzas. The tobacco interests rank immediately after those of sugar and give the wealth to the province of Pinar del Rio. The best tobacco is grown in the district of Yuelta de Abajo, a little W of Havana, about 64 miles in length and 21 in breadth and here the mildest and finest flavored is produced on the banks of the San Sebastian, most of which is made into cigars, celebrated under the name of Havana cigars. The tobacco crop for the year 1899-1900 amounted to 460,000 bales of 110 pounds each the export to the United States alone being valued at $9,700,000. The tobacco exports in 1902 were leaf tobacco, 34,000,000 pounds cigars 208,000,000 (in number) and cigarettes, 11,500,000 packets. Coffee-planting which was at one time a leading industry has entirely fallen off in importance. While in the first quarter of the nineteenth century Cuba exported more coffee than Java, its present production (about 150,000 bags) is less than a hundredth of that of the entire world and hardly sufficient to meet the demands of the island.

Animals.—The Cuban fauna is characterized more by negative than by positive characters, and shows the effects of long-continued isolation or insularity. Exclusive of bats there are only two indigenous mammals the agouti or cavy and the peculiar insectivore Solenodon. The domestic quadrupeds have been introduced. Birds are numerous, comprising forms that are tropicopolitan in habit and many migrants from the United States. There are no venomous serpents the boa, anaconda, and crocodile may be taken to represent the types of the Reptilia. Fossil mammalian remains found in various cave-deposits would seem to indicate a not improbable union during middle Tertiary and still later times between the island and Central America and Florida.

Mineral Resources.—The chief metallic resources of Cuba is iron-ore, the most important mining centre of which is located in the Sierra Maestra, near Santiago de Cuba and Jaruquí. Rich deposits of manganese occur in nearly the same region and in the Sierra del Cobre are located what were at one time the largest producers of copper in the world. In the second quarter of the past century upward of $2,000,000 worth of copper was shipped to the United States annually. These mines are now in greater part abandoned. The exportation of iron-ore to the United States is about 50,000 tons per month. Asphaltum obtained in largest quantity in the Bay of Cardenas and in the vicinity and salt are important products. Gold and silver appear to occur only sparingly.

Subsistence, Government.—About two-thirds of the inhabitants are Spanish-speaking whites of whom about one-tenth are natives of Spain. The planters are generally of Spanish descent. The laboring class is composed mainly of the late slaves of African blood and their descendants. There are a considerable number of Chinese coolies. Education is in an exceedingly backward condition the system of government under the rule of Spain having been of the most illiberal character. In 1800 64 per cent. of the population were unable to read. New educational measures were put into force in June 1900 during the company of the island by the United States and important advances are expected. The University of Havana, with faculties of letters, sciences, medicine, pharmacy, and law was attended in 1901 by about 800 students. The seat of government is at Havana, the chief city. The chief-magistrate is a president (elected for a term of 4 years) who is assisted by a cabinet of 6 members. The legislative body consists of a senate and a house of representatives. The present constitution was adopted in Feb 1901. Communication in the interior of Cuba is still difficult owing to the wretched condition of the roads. There were in 1900 about 1100 miles of railroads in operation. The island is divided into the six provinces of Havana, Matanzas, Pinar del Rio, Puerto Príncipe, Santa Clara, and Santiago, giving a total population (in 1899) of 1,572,797. The most populous city is Havana which in 1902 had an estimated population of about 275,000. The second city is Santiago de Cuba, with a population of 45,000.

History.—Cuba was discovered by Columbus during his first voyage in 1492. About 20 years later the settlement by the Spaniards was begun. The Indians were soon reduced to subjection and under the relentless treatment of their task-masters they were speedily exterminated. Negroes took their place as slaves. The island prospered economically under Spanish rule but the oppressive and arbitrary sway of the captains-general became intolerable. In 1808 the friends of Cuban independence rose in arms, and for ten years carried on a relentless warfare with the Spaniards, the war being chiefly confined to the eastern extremity of the island but in 1812 the patriots laid down their arms the Spanish authorities offering terms of great liberality and promising great reforms. In 1820 an act for the abolition of slavery was passed by the Spanish Cortes. A second war for independence beginning in 1825, and the armed intervention of the United States, resulted in 1828 in the complete emancipation of the island from Spanish sovereignty. This was followed by the establishment of a national Cuban government.

Cyprus, si prius (Lurk Ark. i. kos brecon (Gr. h. apes) an island of the Levant in the Mediterranean near the mouth of the Gulf of Iskanderun 44 miles S of Cape Anamur, in Anatolia, and 60 miles W of Latakia, in Syria with which it is connected by cable. Cape St. Andreas its N. E. extremity which is at the end of a long narrow peninsula, is in lat. 35° 41' 42" N lon. 34° 30' 30" E Area 3584 sq. in. The island nominally forms part of the Turkish Empire but is virtually a British possession governed by a British high-commissioner. It is about 143 miles in length with a general width of 40-50 miles. Its surface is constituted by a low lying central and exceedingly fertile plain the Mesoreia or Mesaria, and of a northern and a southern littoral mountain range, the former having summits (Bullerovo Pentadaktylus) (Korona) rising to 2580-3100 feet and the latter (the Olympian) culminating in Mt. Troodon 6408 feet, the highest elevation of the island. The central plain and northern mountains are of comparatively recent origin. The prevailing formation of the mountains in the N. division is limestone. The S. portion of the mountain seems seemingly of Archæan age, yields asbestos, gypsum, red Jasper, copper and some gold and silver. The copper mines were once important and the modern name of the island is derived from the word Cyprus.

Cyprus is deficient in water its streams being chiefly mountain torrents which dry up in summer. The only permanent river of importance is the Pedias (anc. Pediasus) which waters the valley of Nicosia, flows E. and discharges at Famagusta. A second stream coursing in the same direction is the Idalis or Yalios. The climate is in general healthy but some sections particularly of the S. coast are malarial. The mountains of Cyprus are still in part covered with vast forests of excellent timber almost exclusively conifers. The island is esteemed the richest and most fertile in the Levant, although it has few level tracts of country those around Nicosia, Famagusta, Larnaca, Limassol, and Bafra (Paphos) being the chief. Agriculture is in a backward state. Cotton, wheat, barley and tobacco of good quality are grown. madder, flax, sesamum and the poppy are raised in numerous localities. Silk is produced abundantly. Wine is the most noted production of the island and is of excellent quality. The commoner cultivated fruits are the orange, citron, date and fig. Cyprus is famed in the East for its fine mules. Many camels are also bred. Among the indigenous animals is the mouflon or wild sheep. The island has at different times suffered from devastation by locusts.

Manufacturing is carried on to some extent. Salt, in large quantities, is obtained from salines at Limassol and Larnaca. The native textile industries comprise the making of embroidery, silk nettings, and various forms of cotton woolen and linen fabrics. Good morocco leather is made at Nicosia.

The principal towns of Cyprus are Nicosia (Lefkadia), the capital near the centre of the island, and Limassol and Larnaca (anc. Citium) the two principal ports, both on the S. coast. The seaport of Famagusta, on the N. coast, near the site of the ancient Salamis, was formerly important.

Originally peopled by the Phœnicians and afterwards colonized by the Greeks, Cyprus was by the latter people dedicated to Venus, whose most celebrated temple was at Lefkos. The island belonged successively to the Assyrians, the Persians (under whom the cities enjoyed a great measure of autonomy) the Egyptians, the Romans, and the Byzantines. It was one of the first places, out of Palestine, that received the gospel. In the time of the Crusades it was taken from the Mohammedans by Richard I. of England, and given by him to the princess of the Lusignan family. After belonging to Venice for a century it was conquered by the Turks in 1571. In 1878 it was conveyed by treaty to Great Britain, the Sultan retaining the sovereignty of the island and receiving an annual payment of money in place of its revenue.

Since the discovery of rich and abundant remains of antiquity in the island, increased interest has been taken in its eventful though somewhat obscure history. Its antiquities have special importance as illustrating stages of the early history of sculpture and the kindred arts. Pop. in 1901 237,622 of whom 182,739 belonged to the Greek church and 51,309 were Mohammedans.

Dalmatia, däl mä shä (It. Dalmazia däl mä shä-l. Ger. Dalmatien, däl-mä-ti-en) a crown-land and titular kingdom of Austria-Hungary in Cisimphania. It consists of a long narrow tract of mountainous country and a number of large islands along the A.E. coast of the Adriatic Sea. It is bounded N. by Croatia A.E. and E. by Bosnia and Herzegovina, and SE. by Montenegro. It extends from the arm of the Adriatic Sea called the Quarnero, in lat. 44° 13' N. to Spizza, (lat. 43° 0' and has an area of 4940 sq. m. In breadth it is very limited not exceeding 40 miles in any part, and at the narrowest, near Ragusa, about 2 miles. It has on its eastern border the Velebit mountains and the Dinaric Alps, with summits rising to 2000-3000 feet (Troglav 2275 ft. Dinaara, 6095 ft.) and further south the mountains of Cattaro with the Orjen rising to 6160 ft. Along the coast stretches a barren chain of mountains, in which are the peaks of Messer 4364 ft. and further SE. Rissovo 6780 ft. The interior of Dalmatia is diversified by undulating ground hills and high mountains—many of the latter having the same rugged barren aspect as those of the coast. The principal rivers, all of them with short courses are the Neretva, in the S. the Zernagva, Krka, and Cetina. Many of the waters are enervating. The country is not rich in metals, although in ancient times it produced large quantities of gold. Iron lignite asphalt and salt are obtained.

The coast is indented with numerous harbors and bays the principal of which are Cattaro Ragusa, Spalato and Sebenico. A vast number of islands—Paget, Braza, Luvina, Curzola—stretch along the shores. Their resources from the main-land have been brought about by subsidence and erosion. Most of these are valuable for their products, such as timber wine, oil cheese, honey salt, and asphalt, and in several of them ship building is carried on. The climate generally is warmer than that of any other part of Austria-Hungary and in spring the crocus is in full. The mean annual temperature of the coast is about 50.

A large part of the land is in pasture and wood. The principal agricultural productions are Indian corn rye barley, figs olives and grapes. Much wine is exported largely for the purpose of adulteration with colored wines. Dalmatia is famed for its Maraschino liqueur. The fruits include the apple, pear, plum almond peach, apricot, lemon orange, carob, and pomegranate. Comparatively few sheep or cattle are reared. Horse raising and dairymaking are the principal occupations. The population in 1900 was 591,597. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Serbo-Croats. The people of the race inhabiting Dalmatia, especially the inhabitants of the interior are known as Morlaks. The non-Slavic element, which is but a small fraction of the population consists mainly of Italians (dwellers in the towns) who number about 20,000. The prevailing religion is the Roman Catholic. One-sixth of the inhabitants belong to the Greek church. Education is very generally diffused by the system of national schools. Principal towns are Zara (the capital), Spalato, and Ragusa.

Dalmatia was conquered by the Romans in the time of Augustus. In the seventh century it was occupied by the Slavs. In the course of the Middle Ages the greater part of it was ceded to Hungary and most of the remainder passed under the sway of Venice. Ragusa was for centuries the seat of an independent republic. In 1797 the Venetian portion the modern Dalmatia together with the bulk of the dominions of Venice, passed to Austria. But in 1805 Dalmatia fell into the hands of Napoleon who first united it to the kingdom of Italy and subsequently to the kingdom of Illyria. The events of 1814 brought Dalmatia again under Austrian rule.

Damascus (Hebrew Damash or Arab. Damiyah).

Sham or simply Sham, a city of Asia Minor, capital of the kingdom of Syria, beautifully situated on a plain at the E base of the Anti-Lebanon range, about 180 miles S by W of Aleppo. Lat. 33° 3'; N. Lon. 36° 26' E. Elevation above the sea about 2300 feet. It is connected by rail with Beirut and a line to Mecca is in course of construction. It is 6 miles in circumference and is surrounded by a dilapidated wall with towers. Its appearance when first opened on the view is impressive. The Arabs regard it as one of their four terrestrial paradises. The plain on which it stands is covered with beautiful gardens and orchards irrigated by the hapid waters of the Barada, forming a grove of more than 50 miles in circuit. But the interior of Damascus by no means corresponds with the beauty of its environs or with the entrancing picture which it presents as a whole with its cupolas and minarets. The streets are narrow and bare, many of them a gloomy and dilapidated look. The houses generally have a mean appearance externally most of them presenting only gray mud walls to the streets. In many of them however a singular contrast is presented between the plain outer walls and the richness within. Those of the more wealthy have beautifully paved courts ornamented with fountain flowers and orange-lemon and pomegranate-trees. The Christian and Jewish quarters are miserable.

Among the places most worthy of notice are the numerous bazars, generally designated by the name of some particular trade or commodity which are merely long streets covered in with high wood work and lined with shops, stalls, warehouses, and cafes. In the midst of the bazaar stands the Khan of Asad Pasha, said to be one of the most magnificent structures of this kind in the East. Here wholesale merchants carry on their business. The so-called Mosque of the Omeyyads, erected early in the eighth century whose walls were reared in part upon those of a Christian church (itself probably the successor of a heathen temple) figures in Arabic literature as one of the wonders of the world. It was partially destroyed by fire in 1893 but is being restored in its former splendid style. There are in all about 250 mosques and Mohammedan schools. The citadel is an extensive and massive square structure. The baths of Damascus are noted for their elegance, and the cafes enjoy an equal reputation. The streets and bazars of the city with their bustle and many-colored costumes, exhibit Oriental life in its most picturesque aspects.

Damascus is one of the holy cities of the Mohammedans, and here the pilgrims assemble on their journey to Mecca and separate on their return from it. It was long the proud emporium of the trade of the Levant, but the altered conditions of traffic since the rise of Alexandria and the construction of the Suez Canal have robbed the city of much of its commercial importance, and its caravan trade is but a shadow of what it was in former days. The inhabitants of Damascus excel in the manufacture of the finished products of Oriental handicraft. The city is noted for its gold and silver embroidered stuffs its metal wares and jewelry in fine inlaid cabinet-work and its saddles and bridles. Fabrics of silk and of silk and cotton mixed are extensively produced. The manufacture of Damascus blades, for which the city was once so celebrated, no longer exists. Its plums and grapes are famous, and rose-water is distilled from its roses. The population numbers about 150,000, about one-fourth being non-Mohammedans. The Christians, who outnumber the Jews, belong mainly to the Greek and United Greek (Melchite) sects. There are a number of Christian schools. Until recently no Christian could walk the streets of the city without incurring the risk of being maltreated. In July 1860 the Mohammedans slaughtered thousands of Christians.

The existence of Damascus as a city dates back to the dawn of history. In the period of the early Jewish kings it was the seat of a kingdom which was at the height of its power in the ninth century B.C. It was a flourishing place under the Romans. In A.D. 631 it became the capital of the Ommiad caliphs, but in the middle of the following century was supplanted by Bagdad.—Adj. and inhab. DAMAS dam'-a-seen is the splendid Neptune Fountain. The principal ecclesiastical edifice is the imposing church of St. Mary containing fine works of art. Other conspicuous edifices are the new building of the Landtag or provincial assembly of West Prussia, the savings-bank, the municipal museum formerly a Franciscan convent, and the new synagogue. The municipal library contains about 120,000 volumes.

The improvements recently made in the beds of the Vistula and Motlawa enable large sea-going vessels to come up to the quays of Danzig. The town possesses an outer port, Neufahrwasser at the mouth of the Vistula. Here a free port for Danzig was created in 1899. The commerce of the city is very extensive, but it no longer holds the position which it held before the introduction of railways when it was the great outlet for the productions of Poland. Its principal trade is in grain, timber and sugar. There are great government establishments here for the manufacture of arms and ammunition. Ship-building is carried on, and connected with the ship-yards are foundries and machine-shops. Among the important industries are sugar refining, distilling and the manufacture of chemicals, vinegar, mineral waters, paper and the liquor called Goldwasser.

Mention is made of the town of Danzig as early as the close of the tenth century. In 1310 it came into the possession of the Teutonic Knights, who held it for a century and a half in the course of which it rose to be a great emporium of trade. It was one of the leading members of the Hanseatic League. On the occasion of West Prussia by the Teutonic Knights to Poland, Danzig was permitted to enjoy an independent existence, with the possession of a considerable district, under Polish protection. In the second partition of Poland, in 1793 the city passed into the possession of Prussia. It suffered greatly in the Napoleonic wars. Pop. in 1890 120,450, in 1900 140,529.

Dardanelles, dar-dā-nell or Hellespont (one Hellespont two) a narrow strait between Europe and Asia connecting the Sea of Marmora and the arms of the Mediterranean known as the Aegean Sea, having SE Asia Minor and NW the peninsula of Gallipoli. Length from NE to SW 40 miles breadth from 1½ to 4 miles. The Asiatic side presents most beautiful scenery and rises gradually from the sea upward to the range of Mount Ida. The European side is, in general steep and rugged. Various reefs form secure harbors for vessels of every size, and on both shores there are numerous forts and batteries, the modern fortifications being on a great scale. There is a double current in the strait, an upper current flowing from the Sea of Marmora and a lower current flowing from the Aegean Sea. The modern name of this strait is derived from the natives called the Dardanelles, situated on its banks at the narrowest part, that on the Asiatic side Telianek Ka was called the castle of Asia, being near the site of the ancient Dardanus. Its ancient name Hellespont (i.e. Sea of Helles) was bestowed with reference to Helle daughter of Athamas, King of Thebes, who was fabled to have been drowned in it. By an agreement between the Great Powers the Dardanelles are closed to non-Turkish vessels of war.

Darfur, dar'foon (i.e. "Country of the Fur") a country of Egyptian Sudan, lying between Kordofan and Wadai and forming part of the Egyptian dominions since 1875. Its limits are ill-defined, but little is known positively regarding the characteristics of the country. It is in great part a plateau of 2000-2500 feet elevation with fertile oases, and rising in a well-defined and richly watered mountain mass or highland, the Marrah of igneous or granitic construction to 8000-7000 feet elevation. There are a number of more or less continuous streams but in many parts water is obtainable only from wells. The heat in Darfur is excessive, and there are, properly speaking only three seasons in the year—spring, summer and autumn. July-September is the season of the rains which continue 75 days. The crops chiefly cultivated are millet, rice, maize, sesame and legumes. Among the fruit trees are the tamarind, orange, citron and date. Tobacco abounds, and is much used by the natives. Cotton is also cultivated.

The inhabitants, chiefly Fure (or Fori) are a mixture of Arabs and negroes, though many individuals of both races still retain their peculiar physical characteristics. Education is little attended to, and is confined to learning to read the Koran, and that by the male children only. The religion is Mohammedanism. As a result of its position the commerce of Darfur is chiefly inland, but this is very considerable. Its principal intercourse is with Egypt carried on by means of caravans. There is also considerable trade with Mecca. Cattle constitute the chief wealth of the country. Capital, El Fasher.

The country was for 400 years ruled by a line of absolute sovereigns the last of whom was defeated and slain by the Egyptian army of conquest in 1874. Since 1899 Darfur has been under Anglo-Egyptian domination. The population is variously estimated at from 1,500,000 to 4,000,000 mostly speaking a dialect of the Arabic.

Delaware, del a-war, a river of the eastern United States formed by two branches sometimes called the Coquago and the Popacon which rise in the Western Catskills of New York near the N. E. border of Delaware and unite at Hancock in the same county. From that point it runs southeastward forming the boundary between New York and Pennsylvania, until it reaches Fort Jervis and touches the northern extremity of New Jersey. Constricted here by the barrier of the Kittatinny Mountains, it descends its course southwestward along the base of that ridge to the Delaware Water Gap, where, in a region of strikingly picturesque scenery, it has cut a gorge-like passage through the mountain and appears on the Atlantic side. The mountain gap, which parallels the crest of the Potomac across the Blue Ridge at Harper's Ferry and that of the Hindon across the Highlands, is 2 miles long and is flanked by precipitous heights which rise 1000-1200 feet above the water. (See DELAWARE WATER GAP.) After passing Easton the river flows southeastward to Bordentown and thence southwestward to Philadelphia, about 40 miles below which between the states of Delaware and New Jersey it expands into the estuary called Delaware Bay (which see). This river forms the entire boundary between New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The length of the river in stream is estimated at 375 miles. It is about 2 of a mile wide at Philadelphia and 2 or 3 miles wide at some points below that city. The tide ascends to Trenton about 130 miles from the sea. The chief towns on its banks are Philadelphia, Wilmington, Camden, Chester, Trenton, Easton, Newmarket, Burlington and Bristol. It is navigable for the largest ships to Philadelphia, and steamboats can ascend to Trenton during high tide. The lowest point at which the river is crossed by a bridge is Philadelphia. A canal follows the right bank of the river from Bristol to Easton about 60 miles, and other connections of the Delaware with the Chesapeake River. The Delaware and Chesapeake Canal also unites Delaware City on the lower river in Delaware, with Chesapeake City Md. and thus places Philadelphia in direct water-communication with Baltimore. The chief tributaries of the Delaware are the Licking and Schuylkill rivers and Brandywine and Rancocas creeks.

Delaware, one of the Middle Atlantic states, is area the smallest state in the Union except Rhode Island is bounded N by Pennsylvania, E by the Delaware River and Bay and the Atlantic Ocean and S and W by Maryland. Its length (from 38° 28' to 39° 50' N. lat.) is 96 miles its breadth ranges from 0 to 35 m. Area, 2050 sq. m. (of the land-surface 1960 sq. m.) more than one-half of which consists of cultivated farm-land.

Face of the Country—The N. portion is finely diversified with hills and dale and is one of the most fertile, beautiful and healthful tracts in the state. Southward the surface is nearly a dead level relieved by a long low ridge or water-shed running N and S and having numerous swampy tracts, whereas flow in the E and W most of the streams of the state. The southern portion is mainly sandy with large marsh and swamp-tracts remaining. The highest elevation of the state appears to be only 280 feet above the sea. Along the coast there are salt-marshes and a few shallow lagoons fringed from the open sea by long, low sand-spits. The interior of the state has much light soil which is easily and profitably cultivated. Kolin, bog iron glass-sand, and shell marl are found all of which have been wrought to a considerable extent. The greater part of the state is constituted of Cretaceous, Tertiary and Post-Tertiary deposits, but in the N. the Archæan or Azoic basement nappes lie with the (presumably) Archæan crust of the Philadelphia region. Delaware stands fourth among the states of the Union as a producer of granite. From some of the swamps large quantities of well preserved and excellent timber have been dug and wrought into shingles. There are useful chalybeate waters at Faulkland in the N. The streams—Brandywine, Christina, Duck, Murderkill, Jones, Mispillion, Indian and Nantuxco—are mainly insignificant, although affording many navigable highways to the interior. Christina Creek admits merchant-vessels of considerable tonnage. Delaware Bay and the Delaware River have a deep but not very direct channel and the western shore of the bay at most points is not readily accessible for large vessels. Rehoboth Bay admits vessels of 6 feet draught. The Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, finished in 1829 at a cost of $2,250,000 extends 13½ miles from Delaware City to Chesapeake City Md. and affords passage for coasting-vessels, canal-boats, barges and small steamers. The noble breakwater at Lewes, begun in 1828 by the United States government, was constructed to afford a harbor of refuge, and for this purpose it has proved eminently serviceable.

Products.—Delaware, once celebrated for its excellent wheat still produces bountiful crops of that grain and of the other cereals, especially of corn. The principal agricultural crops were in 1906 corn 5,010,000 bushels wheat 1,460,000 bushels oats 323,700 bushels and hay 44,400 tons. Of late years the production of fruit notably of peaches, with strawberries and then other small fruits has been the leading industry. Market gardening particularly the raising of early spring vegetables for the supply of the Northern cities, for which the fertile soil and genial climate of the state give a special fitness, attracts much capital. The fruit-transporting and canning industries with large plants at Durrer Millford, Middletown Smyrna, etc. are prosecuted on an extensive scale. Oyster menhaden and other fisheries and the working of phosphate are also important non-manufacturing industries of the state.

Manufactures are carried on chiefly in Wilmington and its vicinity. The manufactured products are various and include leather and leather goods, ships (iron and wood) machinery cottons, woolsens, cars and carriages, saw wheels, signs, pumps, wire, lumber, cast and wrought iron, hardware, floor paper, tobacco, matches, and chemicals.

Counties.—Delaware has 3 counties. New Castle in the N. Kent in the center and Sussex in the S. The principal towns are Wilmington a thriving manufacturing city and railroad centre (pop. in 1900 64,373) Durrer the capital (pop. 3323) New Castle (pop. 3300) Smyrna Lewes, Delaware City Millford Laurel Seaford and Georgetown. The chief educational institution is Delaware College, located at Newark. An agricultural college (in colored students) is at Dover.

Constitution.—The first constitution was adopted in 1716. A second was adopted in 1792 and the present one in 1901. The governor is elected for four years. The senate consists of 17 members, 7 from the northern county and 5 from each of the other two. They are chosen for a term of four years. The house of representatives has 15 members; the northern county furnishing 15 and the remaining two 10 each. The legislature, called the General Assembly, meets biennially. Delaware has 1 representative in the national congress.

History.—Delaware Bay was discovered by Hudson in 1609 and visited in 1611 by Lord De la Warr. In 1631 the Dutch established a settlement near Cape Henlopen which was destroyed by the Indians in 1633. In 1638 some Swedes and a few founded the colony of New Sweden which extended as far up the river as Wicomico now in Philadelphia. The region was claimed by the Dutch and war ensued resulting in 1664 in the breaking up of the Swedish colony by Dutch forces from New Amsterdam. When New Netherland fell into the hands of the English the possession of Delaware was disputed by the Duke of York and Lord Baltimore. The year 1683 witnessed the purchase of the proprietorship by William Penn. Thenceforth the region which was known as the Three Lower Counties on the Delaware, was governed as a part of Pennsylvania until 1703, when it received a separate legislature. The three counties remained, however, under the proprietary governors of Pennsylvania until the Revolution. In 1776 Delaware declared itself an independent state. Delaware was the first state to ratify the United States constitution 1787. It retained slavery until it was abrogated in 1863 by the thirteenth amendment to the Federal constitution.

Delgado (dēl gā dō) Cape, on the E coast of Africa in the Indian Ocean. Lat. 10° 24' S.

Delhi, or Dehli, dēl lē (anc. Indraprastha after words Indr) a city of British India capital of a district and division of the same name, in the SE corner of the Punjab and formerly capital of the Mogul empire. It is on the right bank of the Jumna. Lat. 28° 40' N. lon. 77° 17' E. The river is here crossed by a splendid railway bridge. The town consists of a Mahammedan and a Hindu quarter. The English district, containing the arsenal and barracks, is separated from the rest of the city. Delhi is partly surrounded by a lofty stone wall with a number of imposing gates. The principal street is lined with stately buildings and is an ancient thoroughfare. Under the old Mogul emperors, Delhi became in the seventeenth century the most magnificent city in the world. The population of this city at the height of its splendor is said to have numbered 2,000,000. Many of the finest architectural monuments are now dilapidated or in ruins. The vast palace of Shah Jahan (called the Fort) the abode of the Mogul emperors in part torn down by the authorities since the rebellion of 1857, was a surpassing product of Modern architecture. It is a mile or more in circuit and presents in its interior a bewildering display of carvings and inlaid work. The Jumna Vauki or great mosque, also the work of Shah Jahan built of red sandstone and white marble is one of the glories of India. Another remarkable structure is the black mosque. In the suburbs are the splendid tombs of the imperial family. The Kutab-Minar is an exquisitely constructed tower rising to a height of 238 feet and tapering from a width of 47 ft. to 8 ft. at the top. The surrounding country to the extent of 40 sq. m. is covered with the debris of ruined buildings. The town is well supplied with water by an aqueduct and has public gardens of great extent and beauty. The banners of Delhi are famous for their shawls, their precious stones, and their gold- and silver-ware. The city is a great industrial, banking and commercial centre. Delhi may be regarded as the capital of Mohammedanism in India. Its printing presses are busy reproducing the masterpieces of Arabic Persian and Hindustani literature. The city first became the seat of an independent Mohammedan realm at the beginning of the thirteenth century. It was taken by Baber the founder of the Mogul dynasty in 1526 and has been under British rule since 1803. In 1857 it was the scene of a terrible massacre of Europeans and in the same year it was stormed and taken by a small British and native force after a memorable siege. Pop in 1872 154,417. In 1891 193,590. In 1901 205,485.

Physical Features and Geology—The coast is generally low and sandy the western coast of Jutland being a succession of sand ridges and shallow lagoons, dangerous to shipping. The eastern coast is not so inhospitable, and contains several excellent harbors especially in the islands. The long fjords or fiords penetrating far into the land constitute the most distinctive physical feature. The most remarkable of these is the Lyngfjord or Limfjord, which crosses Jutland, so that its N portion is insular. Inland the surface is low the highest point, the Kjer Bævneshøj in eastern Jutland, being only 560 feet above sea-level. The greater part of the land, which is structurally a continuation of the plateau of northern Germany lies at an elevation of less than 100 feet. Though low the surface is pleasantly diversified, running a little at the coast and into flattened knolls in the interior. The landscape of the islands and the southeastern part of Jutland is rich in beech woods, corn-fields, and meadows but in the western and northern districts of Jutland this gives place to a wide expanse of moraine covered with heather. Extensive areas of dune-land line the W coast, and in the interior there is considerable steppeland. There are neither rivers nor lakes of importance, the Guden (Guden aa), the largest Danish stream being little more than a creek, although it measures nearly 100 miles in length. Other streams are the Rhoos-aa, Konge-aa, Skjern-aa, Skive-aa, etc. All the Danish rocks belong to the upper series of the Mesozoic and the Tertiary formations, and have been deposited in regular succession. The rock most fully developed is chalk above the chalk lies an extensive (glacial) boulder formation, immediately above which are thick beds of clay and marl. Elsewhere a fairly massive brown-coal or lignite is interposed between the chalk and the glacial drift, which includes much moraine material.

Climate—The climate presents no remarkable features much resembling that of Scotland, except that its transitions are more rapid. Its main feature is humidity. The mean temperature of Copenhagen is 37° Fahr in winter and 63.5° in summer. The mean for the year is 44.5°. The annual rainfall is about 21 inches. Snow falls on an average 30 days in the year and storms of wind and rain are frequent.

Fauna and Flora—The fauna presents no special peculiarities. All the larger wild quadrupeds even the reindeer are now extinct. The fox badger here and some others of the smaller quadrupeds that belong to the north of Europe are still found. The small domestic animals are abundant with the exception of the goat. The flora presents a greater variety the ordinary north European plants growing luxuriantly in the mild and protected soil of the eastern coast and the islands. There is considerable heath land. The Danish forests, which now cover hardly 6 per cent of the land surface are almost entirely made up of beech. The oak was at one time the characteristic tree but both it and the ash are now exceedingly rare. Except in Bornholm no conifer grows in Denmark save under cultivation.

Agriculture—Denmark is essentially an agricultural country. It is a great grain producing region. Oats, barley and rye take the lead among the cereals. Potatoes are largely grown and beet are raised in prodigious quantities for the manufacture of sugar. The usual European fruit trees and bushes, as apples pears, plums, cherries, gooseberries raspberries and currants, produce good crops, and even peaches and apricots ripen in sheltered spots. But cattle-breeding and dairy husbandry are the great features of Danish agriculture and the leading industries of the country. Dairy produce and live-stock constitute the bulk of the exports the principal share of which goes to Great Britain. The exports of pork butter eggs, and lard in 1899 were valued at 190,000,000 kroner (about $48,000,000). The total exports of home produce in 1902 amounted to 119,687,000 kroner. The land is minutely subdivided owing partly to the state of the law which prohibits the entry of small farms and encourages the parceling out of landed property.

Minerals—The mineral products are unimportant, Denmark being in this respect one of the poorest countries of Europe. Although a good quality of lignite is found in some parts, most of the peasants burn turf and peat for home-fuel.

Manufactures and Commerce—Manufacturing is not carried on to any large extent. A notable industry is the manufacture of porcelain. The Copenhagen potters are famous for very graceful design and their products in porcelain have a distinctive character. There are considerable iron foundries, especially around Copenhagen. In the same city there are manufactures of locomotives and machinery. The woollen, linen and cotton manufactures as well as those of gloves, hosiery wooden shoes, etc. are mostly domestic and carried on for local consumption. Sugar refiners prepare most of the sugar from beets for the home market. In 1902 the production of beet-sugar amounted to 388,234 tons of margarine and oleomargarine, 11,730 tons. The distilling and brewing industries are considerable. Amber is gathered in large quantities. The commercial marine of Denmark consists of about 4000 vessels aggregating over 480,000 tons. The most important seaports are Copenhagen Aalborg Århus and Elsinore. The Danish fisheries are still of considerable importance. Turbot, torsk herring, and salmon are largely caught, and oyster beds occur on the E coast and elsewhere. The seal fisheries are considerable, the principal station being the island of Anholt. The total value of the Danish fisheries in 1901 was 8,583,478 kroner (about $2,160,000).

The Present Army and Navy—Danes are a hereditary constitutional monarchy. The diet (Rigsdag) consists of two houses, called respectively the Folkething (lower house) and the Landsting (upper house or senate). The members of the Folkething are elected for a term of three years by the direct vote of all citizens who have reached the age of thirty years. The Landsting consists of 66 members most of whom are chosen by indirect election for a term of eight years, there being 12 life-members, appointed by the crown. The state council or cabinet (Statsraadet) is composed of 8 ministers: the president (who is also minister of foreign affairs) and the ministers of the interior, justice, finance, war, marine, public instruction and ecclesiastical affairs, and agriculture. The hereditary nobility of Denmark has been abolished.

There were, in 1893, 1879 miles of railway in operation.

Church Education, etc.—The established religion is Lutheran, but unlimited toleration is conceded to all no man being bound to contribute to support a form of worship of which he is not a member. The church is under 7 bishops, who are nominated by the crown. The Bishop of Seeland or Roskilde is the metropolitan and the sees of the other bishops correspond to the other 6 stifts or ecclesiastical provinces. There are few dissenters. At the head of the educational institutions is the famous university of Copenhagen founded in 1479. There are a veterinary and agricultural colleges at Copenhagen about 20 agricultural or horticultural schools, a college of pharmacy a royal academy of arts, nearly 100 technical and commercial schools, etc. The inhabitants of Denmark are nearly all Danes. No country in the world has a more homogeneous population. The Danish language is a member of the Scandinavian group of languages (forming part of the Teutonic stock) to which the old Norse, Norwegian, Icelandic, and Swedish belong. Danish is the literary language of Norway. The land is rich in antiquities, its kykkun mœdding (kitchen middens or refuse-heaps) in which relics of the aboriginal inhabitants are found constituting a distinctive feature.

History.—The earliest inhabitants of Denmark of whom history leaves any record were the Cimbric, the same people who menaced the Roman dominions at the close of the second century B.C. From them the main land received its name of the Cimbric Chersonese. We next hear of a Gothic race occupying the land, under their mythical chief Olo, whose successors made themselves the terror of western Europe under the name of Northmen or Vikings. Three successive Danish kings (Canute Harold Hardrada's son) ruled England from 1017 to 1042. After their conversion to Christianity this people so extended their sway that the Baltic was regarded as a Danish inland sea. In 1397 Margaret of Denmark by the treaty of Kalmar nullified the three Scandinavian kingdoms, and after the dissolution of the union the Danes retained Norway till 1814 when it was ceded to Sweden. In 1849 the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein revolted against Danish rule, and appealed to the German powers for support. Prussia and some of the other states took up arms in their behalf but the intervention was a half-hearted one and the duchies were allowed to return under Danish sway in the terms of the London Protocol of 1852. In the second Schleswig-Holstein War 1864, the armies of Prussia and Austria effected the liberation of the duchies which together with Lauenburg, were incorporated with Prussia in 1866.

District, a township of Berks co. Pa. Pop in 1900 651.

District of Columbia, a district of the United States containing the federal capital. It has the Potomac River as its SW boundary and is enclosed on all other sides by Maryland. The district originally comprised a tract 10 miles square lying on both sides of the Potomac, but in 1846 that portion lying SW of the river was retroceded to Virginia by the United States. Present area, 60 sq m (land 60 sq m water 0 sq m). It was formerly divided into the cities of Georgetown and Washington and the co of Washington but there are no longer any distinctions having civil significance. Georgetown which existed as a municipality before the foundation of Washington was deprived of its charter in 1871 and became part of Washington in 1878. Mount Pleasant, Tenallytown, Brightwood, Uniontown, Benning etc. are small places outside of the strict limits of Washington.

The face of the country is undulating with fine hills and pleasant fertile valleys and a light, fertile soil. The Potomac is a noble tidal stream navigable for vessels of large burden up to Washington. The Anacostia River known also as the East Branch of the Potomac, is the eastern boundary of Washington and the picturesque Rock Creek separates the city within its original limits from Georgetown. The geological formation is Cretaceous, covered with an extensive conglomerate or breccia, the age of which still remains somewhat uncertain.

Industries—The agricultural and market-gardening facilities of the district are very good and the market for farm and garden-products excellent. The principal manufactures are those of flour and other mill products, brick and lumber carried on mainly at Georgetown which has a considerable coasting trade. In the fiscal year ending June, 1900 there were no exports. The imports entered in the Georgetown customs district aggregated in value $208,730. The Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio R. connect Washington with Baltimore and the North and West; and a railroad bridge across the Potomac connects the city with the southern railroad systems.

Public Works—The permanent institutions of the general government, as well as those of the district as such, besides the Washington Asylum for the United States Soldiers and Sailors, Orphan Asylum, Freedmen's Hospital, National Soldiers Home, National Deaf-Mute College, and many institutions, public and private, devoted to charity and the relief of the afflicted. The principal government and other institutions are noticed in the article WASHINGTON.

Education—Separate free public schools are maintained for white and colored children. There are normal high, grammar intermediate, and primary schools. In 1899 the enrollment of pupils in the public schools was 45,560 with an average attendance of 34,032. The district is the seat of the Catholic University of America, Georgetown University (Roman Catholic), Columbian University (Baptist), Howard University (for colored), Gonzaga College (Roman Catholic), the National Deaf-Mute College, and the Carnegie Institute, founded in 1902. Among professional schools are several theological law and medical schools, mostly departments of some one of the universities, and a school of pharmacy. The Smithsonian Institution, National Museum, the United States Signal Office, Naval Observatory, Loran's Artillery, Army Medical Museum, the botanical garden, zoological garden and the Congressional and other public libraries add largely to the educational advantages of the district. Washington is the seat of numerous scientific associations and of the special national surveys of the states and territories. See WASHINGTON D. C.

History—From the time of the close of the Revolutionary war until 1800 there were earnest discussions as to the place where the seat of the United States government should be fixed. Philadelphia, Carlisle, Philadelphia again, then Princeton, Annapolis, Trenton and New York were in turn the temporary places of the meetings of Congress. In 1788 Maryland ceded to the United States the present territory for the purpose of establishing here the seat of federal authority and in 1790 Virginia augmented the gift by the cession of a tract of 34 sq m on the SW side of the river. The gift was accepted by Congress in 1790 and the year 1800 was settled upon as the date of the establishment of the national capital on the banks of the Potomac River. More than 100 years before the site of the future capital had been named Rome by the proprietor of a plantation situated there, one Francis Pope, and the hill where the United States capitol stands was by him called the Capitoline Hill. Congress met at Philadelphia from 1790 to 1800. The new town was incorporated in 1802 and named Washington. The county and city of Alexandria, on the Virginia side, were retroceded to Virginia in 1846. Congress abolished slavery in the District of Columbia in 1802. Before 1871 the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the co. of Washington had a corporate existence, but Congress had exclusive legislative control and the people of the district had no delegate or other representative in Congress. The more important judicial positions were filled by the federal authority. In 1871 a territorial government was instituted by Congress and the district was permitted to send a delegate to the national house of representatives. In 1874 Congress abolished the territorial system and placed the government in the hands of 3 commissioners appointed by the president of the United States. The mixtures have no vote in district or national affairs.

Population—In 1800 the total population of the district was 6,144. In 1810 15,411. In 1820 25,336. In 1830 30,261. In 1840 38,451. In 1850 (after the retrocession of Alexandria city and co.) 51,687. In 1860 158,000. In 1870 171,700. In 1880 177,624. In 1890 236,302. and in 1900 287,718 of whom 85,000 were colored.

Don Cossacks, Territory of the, or Territory of the Army of the Don, a government of southeastern Russia, comprising a great part of the lower basin of the Don and bordering on the Sea of Azov. Area, about 63,500 sq m. The portion on the left side of the Don belongs to the region of the Steppes. In the other half there are plateaus and hilly tracts. The chief rivers, in addition to the Don are its affluents, the Khoper and the Donets. The soil is extremely fertile and, in addition to the regular crops, yields grapes and other fruit in abundance. Vast numbers of horses, cattle, sheep, goats and hogs are reared. The population is mainly composed of Cossacks a race of uncertain origin, representing apparently a mixture of Russian Polish and Tartar blood. They are scattered over large areas in southeastern and eastern Russia and there are a number of them in Siberia. The Cossacks are noted for their martial qualities, and, as light horsemen form an important element in the Russian army. The whole structure of society among the Don Cossacks is military and the administration of this province is different from that of the other Russian governments. The governor is a civil and military officer who bears the title of ataman or hetman. The population in 1897 was 2,675,818. The mineral products include coal, lead, and iron. Dresden, a circle of the kingdom of Saxony. It wholly belongs to the basin of the Elbe, which traverses it from SE to NW and towards both banks of which the surface slopes down into tolerably level tracts of great fertility. In other parts it is very mountainous.

Dresden, drâz dên (Ger. pron drâz dên, L. Dres'da) a city of Germany, capital of the kingdom of Saxony on both banks of the Elbe, 103 miles S by E of Berlin and 230 miles ENE of Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Lat. (observatory) 51° 2' 16" N. lon. 13° 43' 43" E. It is situated in a picturesque and fertile valley and consists of the Altstadt (Old Town) with its numerous sub-urbs, then the lira alsch vorstadt, Johannstadt, Neustadt, and Wilsdruffer Vorstadt, and the quarter of Friedrichstadt, all on the left bank of the river and the Neustadt (New Town) formerly known as Alt Dresden with its various suburbs Antonstadt, Leipziger Vorstadt, etc. on the right bank. The river is crossed by many bridges, the oldest the Augustusbrücke with eleven arches, dating from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

The old town consists of narrow streets and lofty houses. The newer portions of the city are more open but the houses are not so lofty but are generally of a pleasing exterior frequently surrounded by gardens. In the Altstadt are located the principal public buildings and palaces with their art treasures. The most prominent is the royal palace, a vast complex irregular building embracing lofty towers, galleries, arched gateway and the Griene (Garden) (the Grüne Vault), the repository of the immense royal collection of gems, costly art objects, and bric-à-brac, perhaps the richest collection of its kind in all Europe. This building dates from the sixteenth century and was subsequently enlarged and embellished, especially in the time of Augustus the Strong. The other notable edifices in the Altstadt are the Royal Catholic Church adjoining the royal palace the splendid museum one of the noblest examples of modern Renaissance architecture with its famous gallery of paintings, one of the finest north of the Alps the ornate collection of pavilions and one-storied galleries called the Zauniger containing works of art principally casts and scientific and natural sciences collections the handsome new court theatre, the Prinzenpalais, the Protestant Court Church (dating from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries) and the museum Johannsmuseum with its historical and valuable porcelain and pottery collections. The Japanische Palais or Augusteum, in which the royal library of 400,000 volumes and the antiquarian collection are kept, is in the Neustadt. Other buildings of interest are the Brühl palace, erected by the powerful minister of Augustus II. the academy of fine arts, the art exposition hall (the two latter buildings flanking the spacious Brühl Terrace) the fine royal guard house, several town-halls, besides interesting churches and many handsome residences. Dresden is studded with sculptural monuments including equestrian and allegorical statues, busts and beautiful fountains, in bronze and in stone. Many of these works are the creations of the famous sculptors, Rietchel, Sehling, Habert and Henns who made this city their home. Among the most prominent of these monuments are the one to King Frederick Augustus I. the equestrian statue of Augustus the Strong and King Johann the Germanic monument and the Wettin obelisk to commemorate the 800th anniversary of the present dynasty of the House of Wettin.

Hardly another town in the world has so many large and valuable collections of paintings, statuary, gems, arms, porcelain, jewels, and other objects of vertu and it is these collections which give Dresden its chief attraction and which have won for it the appellation of the German Florence. The city is well supplied with beautiful and elegantly laid out walks. After the Napoleonic wars the fortifications were leveled and their site converted into gardens, promenades, and squares. The Brühl Terrace, in front of the Brühl palace, overlooking the Elbe, the Great Garden in the Pirn suburb, 5 miles in circumference adjoining which is the nursery of fruit-trees, the gardens of the Japanese Palace, the zoological and botanical gardens, and Prince George's garden are among the favorite places of public resort. Dresden is the seat of numerous excellent educational institutions, and it is a great musical as well as art centre. Among special schools are the royal technological and veterinary institutes and the academy of fine arts. The city is the residence of a large foreign population, many of them attracted hither by the advantages offered in the way of musical and art study. Dresden is noted for its fine bathing-establishments. It is generously equipped with charitable and benevolent institutions. The manufacturing industries of Dresden are many and varied, including the manufacture of machinery, pianos, bicycles, boats, metal-wares, including gold and silver ware, china and glass, chemical apparatus, confectionery, beer, and cigars. There are numerous printing, lithographic, and photographic establishments. Dresden partakes of the climate of the Elbe valley which is subject to sudden changes. Mean annual temperature 49° Fahr. winter 35°; summer 66°.

Dresden appears originally to have been a village of Wendish Bohemians on the right bank of the Elbe, where the present Neustadt is situated. In the eleventh century the town was built on the left bank, where the Altstadt now stands. In the eighteenth century under Augustus (Frederick Augustus) the Strong and his successor Augustus (Frederick Augustus) II. Dresden attained great splendor. Here on Aug. 26-27, 1813 was fought a great battle between Napoleon and the allies, under Prince Schwarzenberg, in which the French were victorious. Pop. in 1834 73,614 in 1858 117,754 in 1880 220,218 in 1901 399,742 in 1903 (the area having been largely extended) 494,000.

The limits of the region are ill-defined, and no precise boundaries, political or physical, are given to it by geographers. The country is chiefly comprised between the Tien-Shan on the S. and the Greater Altai on the N. and in the E. it merges into the Mongolian Gobi tract. The surface consists chiefly of a moderately elevated and almost desert plateau surrounded and partly intersected by lofty mountain chains. Numerous rivers descend from the mountains but many of them disappear in the sands of the desert or empty themselves into the lakes. The central Dzungarian basin sinks to a level of only 800 feet elevation. In the W. it is watered by the Ili and in the N. by the Black Irtysh whose valley affords an easy passage into Semipalatinsk. Large tracts are nearly or altogether unfit for human habitation but some of the plains and many of the valleys are covered with good pastures, and millet and barley are extensively cultivated. Large forests occur in the N. The domestic animals are principally the camel and buffalo. Among the minerals are gold, copper and iron. Salt is obtained in abundance both from salt-lakes and from mines. The inhabitants of Dzungaria, numbering a few hundred thousand comprise Dzungars, Torgots, Khalkas, and Dzungars. The Dzungars and Torgots are Kalmuck tribes. The emperor of China, after a long and bloody war conquered Dzungaria shortly after the middle of the eighteenth century and since that period it has been treated as a Chinese province.

Ecuador, ek wa-dor (Sp. pron. e-kwa-dór) (i. e., 'Equator') a republic of South America, lying under the equator. It has the republic of Colombia on the N., Peru on the E., the Pacific Ocean on the W. and Peru and Brazil on the S. The eastern section of the boundary lines remains in dispute, and with it a section of the country that adjoins Brazil, Colombia, and Peru. Until the boundaries are definitely settled the area of the latter can only be approximated. The Galápagos Islands belong to Ecuador. The official area, exclusive of the Galápagos Islands, is 116,660 sq. m. comprised in the 16 provinces of Azuay, Bolívar, Cacha, Cacha, Chimborazo, Cotacachi, Guayas, Imbabura, Loja, Loja, Manabí, Oriente, Oros, Pichincha, Los Rios, and Tungurahua. Pop. inclusive of wild Indians, estimated at 1,400,000.

Physical Features.—This republic like the others situated along the Andes, embraces every variety of climate, having tierras calientes on low and hot tracts, tierras templadas, or temperate regions, from 8000 to 9000 feet above the sea, tierras frías or cold districts, extending from the upper limits of the preceding to the borders of the paramos or cold deserts lying between the elevation of 11 000 feet and the limits of perpetual snow and finally, the nevados or snowy heights themselves. The culminating summits in this part of the Andes are ranged close together in double file or along the outer edges of a narrow elevated longitudinal plateau or ridge-hugland in the hollows of which are collected the chief population of the state. On the W of this elevated tract, towards the sea, the declivities of the Cordilleras are covered with dense forests. On the E, also impenetrable forests occupy the mid-region between the temperate heights and the vast plains below. The double range of snow-clad mountains several of them active volcanoes encloses a series of valleys varying in elevation from 8800 to 14 000 feet which together constitute what was at one time known as the longitudinal Andean valley of the republic. Among these mountains, which figure as one of the most remarkable volcanic groups on the earth are the following whose range in height is from 15 000 to 20 500 feet.

W RANGE.	E RANGE.
Cotacachi	Cayambe 18 900 ft.
Pichincha	Sara-Leca
Cornu	Antanuco, 18 800 ft (approx)
Illimani	Cotacachi 18 500 ft
Atacaguala	Atari 11 700 ft
Chimborazo 20 500 ft.	Tungurahua
	Sangu
	Simaholaga

Towards the N limit of Ecuador the E and W mountain masses converge to form the elevated tracts known as the Páramos de los Pastos, or the knot of Pasto in southern Colombia. There is a similar convergence towards the N in the knot of Loja, and between these focal points lie the series of elevated plateau valleys—with that of Quito on the N—to which reference has been made. About 40 miles N of the equator the valley of Quito is clouded by the Alto de Chimborazo. S of Chimborazo the ridge again opens and the valley of Ambato extends upward of 100 miles in length between Chimborazo and Cotacachi on the one side and the group of Sangay on the other. It terminates on the S at the tract of the ridge of Asaya where the páramo attains the height of 15 000 feet. Beyond this towards the S the valley of Cuenca succeeds and stretches about 30 miles to the mountains of Loja. None of the summits on the sides of this valley attain the height of perpetual snow indeed, the highest of them probably does not exceed 11 000 feet and beyond the valley of Cuenca, towards the Marañon the mountains sink to an elevation of 2000 or 3000 feet. Among the mountains enumerated above Chimborazo holds the first place. Cotacachi though not the highest, is the most conspicuous peak in this most remarkable region of the Andes, and seemingly the loftiest active volcano of the globe.

The cultivated land of Ecuador lies chiefly in the valleys of Quito, Ambato and Cuenca. The average height of this tract is about 9000 feet above the sea though at its S extremity at and beyond Loja, it sinks about 2000 feet. The slopes of the Andes on both sides are still covered with forest on which the encroachments of man are scarcely perceptible. For the broad physical features of the mountains see Annex.

The mineral wealth of Ecuador is fairly extensive, quartz gold being obtained at Zaruma, in the province of Oro, Loja, and elsewhere; placer gold at Esmeraldas and in a number of stream gravels; silver at Illimani in Cuzco etc. and there are extensive deposits of copper and iron. Mercury (in Cuenca) and platinum are also found and there is considerable petroleum. The product of emeralds was at one time of much value.

The rivers are for the most part rapid torrents quite unsuitable for purposes of internal communication and commerce derives comparatively little aid from their navigation. The rivers of the eastern water-shed tributaries of the Amazon have long courses but are not generally navigable till they reach the plains beyond the limits of the settled parts of the country. The Amazon however (here called Marañon) is navigable to Borja for large vessels, and for lighter craft to Chunchuza. Flowing into it are the Santiago, Morona, Pastaza, Tigre, Napo, Ica or Putumayo and Caquetá or Japurá—the last three rivers from 800 to 1000 miles in length and all having a SE course. Some of these waters belong in greater part to territory claimed by Peru. On the W side of the mountains the chief rivers are the Mira, the Esmeralda, and the Guayas, formed by the junction of the Garzón and the Daule. The last-named river affords an important commercial channel. The estuary of its mouth being protected towards the sea by the large island of Puna, forms a secure and capacious harbor called the Gulf of Puna. Guayaquil one of the principal ports on the Pacific coast, lies partly within the rebede of Ecuador.

Climate.—On the plain of Quito, 8500 feet above the sea, there reigns a perpetual spring, with a temperature so constant that even the snow line on the surrounding mountains seems hardly to vary throughout the year. The absolute height of the snow line is here about 15 700 feet. Rain is abundant at Quito, falling generally for a few hours in the afternoon. Fairer S in Loja, and E in the plains there is less rain than at Quito while in the opposite direction towards Barbacoas it rains nearly every day. The country round Guayaquil is inundated to a great extent in the rainy season (July).

Fauna.—The fauna of Ecuador comprises most of the more distinctive types of South American life, including those inhabiting the hot lowland plains as well as those of the highlands and snowy tracts. Among a few of the forms may be mentioned the jaguar, puma, tapir bear sloth, cavy deer and armadillo and among birds, the condor, numerous hummers, parrots, toucans etc. Reptiles are abundant, and insect life is very prolific. The llama, alpaca, and guanaco are domesticated animals of transport.

Flora.—The botanical productions of this country are many and valuable, and include the cinchona or quinine-bearing tree, which is still found in large forest-tracts. Extensive forests occupy the eastern lowlands, and also much of the western slopes of the mountains. In these we find a vast assemblage of the more characteristic vegetal forms of the tropical wilderness while over much of the volcanic tracts, with porous soil the vegetation consists largely of enormous agaves, cacti, and euphorbias. There are large areas of savannas (paysones) of marsh tracts (umbaleras) and of the upland open pastures or páramos. Among the native products are numerous palms (among them the wax-palm) in the rubber cupul dragon's blood, and many valuable kinds of timber. The potato appears to be indigenous to the land. Cacao, coffee, rice, pepper and sugar cane are cultivated in the low country. The plain of Quito produces cotton, maize, excellent wheat, and barley the wheat being a characteristic product of the country. Coffee, cacao, sugar, vegetable ivory, leather. Panama hats, skins, india-rubber, cinchona, bamboo, cacti, papaya, arbolito, etc. are leading articles of export. Cacao grown in Los Rios and other coast-provinces is the staple product. The production in 1902 was 21 500 000 kilos. The export of ivory was for the same year over 18 000 000 kilos. In the equable climate of Quito wheat can ripen at any time of the year and the season of sowing it depends on the several localities on slight differences of elevation. An indigenous species of tobacco rendered fragrant by the process of drying, is cultivated in the neighborhood of Loja. Agriculture is still in a low condition being largely in the hands of the aboriginal race.

Industries and Commerce.—The manufacturing industries of Ecuador are chiefly of a domestic nature. The Indians are comparatively industrious, making cotton-cloth, quilts, carpets and pottery. They are also miners, agriculturists, herdsmen and even manufacturers. Panama hats are extensively made. On the coast they formerly carried on a profitable pearl fishery but this has largely been abandoned. The commerce of Ecuador is chiefly carried on through the ports of Guayaquil and Puna and through Guayaquil. Communication in the lowland interior is mainly effected by the water-ways, on a few of which there is a limited steamboat navigation and which are navigated by an immense fleet of canoes and minor craft. The single highway is that which leads off from Quito towards Guayaquil, having a length of about 125 miles. The longest line of railway is that connecting Durán (opposite Guayaquil) with Guayaquil, 125 miles in length, in fact, almost the entire amount of railroad now in operation. The length of telegraph service is measured on 1240 miles.

Government.—The executive is vested in a president who is elected by direct vote for a term of 4 years. The vice-president a term of office extends from the middle of one presidential term to the middle of the next. The legislative power is vested in a senate and a chamber of deputies (house of representatives). The senators, two from each province, are elected by a direct vote for a term of four years. The members of the lower house are elected for a term of 2 years. The provinces are administered by governors. The Galápagos Islands are under a local administration. Men of all races and complexions are in theory politically equal, but the Indians are practically excluded from any share in the government. The Roman Catholic religion is professed by the inhabitants.

Chief Towns.—The chief towns are Quito the capital Guayaquil, the chief port and next to Quito in population Cuenca, Riobamba, Loja, Ibarra, Ambato, Loja, Paez, Loja, Esmeraldas, and Zarama.

Population.—Of the population of Ecuador the Indians, in great part speaking the Qelshua or some cognate language, form more than half the rest are negroes mulattoes, mestizos, sanboos, and whites the last a small minority. The negroes are comparatively few and chiefly on the coast.

The realm of the Incas extended over the mountain region of Ecuador. The remains of royal roads or cinerways and of temples or palaces at Cayambé and on Asuay (more than 13,000 feet above the sea) attest the grandeur of design and careful execution of the works constructed by the natives. The country was conquered by Ibarra and part of it constituted the presidency of Quito under the viceroys of Peru. The defeat of the Spaniards at Pichincha in 1822 secured the liberation of the province from the Spanish yoke. It became part of the republic of Colombia which was dissolved in 1830 three republics being constituted—New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador.

coldest month,

The name Edinburgh is supposed to be derived from Edwin King of Northumbria, a Saxon prince who, in the seventh century, possessed the southern part of Scotland. It was originally written Edwinesburgh or Edwinesburgh. The Gaelic name Dun Ebru or Danedin is merely a translation of the Saxon name, while its poetical name, Edna, was introduced by George Buchanan. Edinburgh rose into importance in the twelfth century, growing up about the fortress and royal residence on Castle Rock and beside Holyrood Abbey founded by David I. the burgh which arose around the latter being called the Canongate. The place was long considered a border stronghold. In the course of the fifteenth century under the Stuart kings, Edinburgh became the capital of Scotland. Parliament being henceforth regularly assembled here. About 1450 walls were built for protection. The rapid growth of the city within the narrow compass of its fortifications caused the erection of dwellings of unprecedented height, built up against the steep hillsides. In 1513 Edinburgh was visited by the plague. In 1532 the College of Justice was established. The town was taken and burnt in 1554 by an English army under the Earl of Hertford but was recovered from the consequences of that disaster. On Dec. 3, 1557, the first Covenant was signed in the city and during the remainder of the sixteenth century it was the scene of numerous interesting events including many in the history of Queen Mary and in the earlier history of the Reformation, more especially in connection with John Knox whose house (from a window of which he frequently preached) is still standing near the top of the Canongate. On Feb. 23, 1558, the National Covenant was signed in the Greyfriars Churchyard. After the overthrow of Charles I. the Scots having taken up arms in favor of his son Cromwell invaded their country and took Edinburgh Castle. It remained in the possession of the English till the Restoration. In 1746 the city was taken possession of by the rebels under Prince Charles Edward Stuart. Pop. in 1801 60,644; in 1831 136,548; in 1891 263,645; in 1901 316,499 (with Leith 393,773).

Egypt (Gr. ΑΙΓΥΠΤΟΣ L. Aegyptus Hebrew Misraim Coptic Ara Arab Misr Misr) a country at the NE extremity of Africa, nominally forming part of the Turkish empire but virtually constituting a dependency of England. The Egyptian sovereign pays an annual tribute to the sultan in the name of the sultan and places the sultan's name on his national coin. In all matters of internal government, as well as in international affairs however Egypt is independent of Turkey the British government exercising virtual control.

Egypt occupies the valley of the Nile, and extends from the Mediterranean Sea on the north to the 22d parallel of N lat. on the south (as fixed by the treaty of Jan. 19 1899) a short distance north of Wadi Halfa and the Second or Great Cataract, and between the Red Sea on the east and a line on the west which traverses the Libyan Desert, starting from Suez on the Mediterranean and terminating at the southern boundary at about lon 28° E. Within these limits the region covers an area of nearly 300,000 sq. m. of which barely 11,000 following the course of the Nile and modeled into the Delta are capable of cultivation. Egypt adjoins and politically includes the Sinaite peninsula on the NE from which it is partly separated by the Gulf of Suez the Isthmus of Suez forming the connection with the Asiatic continent. The Egyptian Sudan which extends southward from the true southern boundary of Egypt proper nearly to the equator is administered jointly by the Egyptian and British governments. See SUDAN EGYPTIA.

Face of the Country.—As in ancient times Egypt is still conventionally and to a degree geographically divided into two parts of very unequal size—Lower Egypt, known as Misr el Bahri, whose product is comprised mainly within the Delta region and extends southward a short distance beyond Cairo and Upper Egypt, known as El Bahri, the region of the Nile, extending from near Cairo to the southern boundary. East and west of these productive regions are the sandy and limestone, almost waterless, tracts known respectively as the Arabian (Afro-Arabian) and Libyan deserts. The Arabian Desert, not to be confused with the desert of the same name of the opposite continent, rises in step like terraces to lofty plateaus, and is flanked on the immediate borders by a range of granitic and porphyritic mountains a continuation of the mountain system of Abyssinia, which attain elevations, as in the Jebel Gharib, Jebel Zehara, and Jebel Hammada, of 5000-6500 feet. The Libyan tract is mainly a monotonous, flat or gently undulating lowland of desert, with a general elevation of 300-400 ft. and constructed superficially of Tertiary limestones. A number of oases are included in this tract, the best known of which are the Fayyum, SW of Cairo. Barich about five days' journey SW of the Fayyum. Farafra, in lat. 27° N. Siwah (Jupiter Ammon) in the NW. El Dakhel in lat. 25° 30' N. and El Kharga in lat. 25° N. the largest of the Egyptian oases not contiguous to the Nile, having a north and south extent of about 80 miles. A number of points in this region are depressed below sea-level, as the bitter Lake NW of Barich (80 ft.) and the oases of Siwah (100 ft.). The Birket-Kerna N of the Fayyum seemingly a relic of the ancient and much larger Lake Meris, lies 120 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. It measures about 33 miles in length. (See MAP.) The oasis or province of the Fayum sometimes known as the land of trees, is a region of fertile soil which is irrigated by the water which flows in numerous ramifications, of the Bahariyah through a Canal a channel of the Nile which diverges from the main stream above Suez and follows an independent course for upward of 200 miles. Although enclosed by hills of the Libyan Desert, the Fayum might with propriety be considered a part of the Nile region. See FAYUM.

Upper Egypt is practically included in the narrow valley of the Nile which expands in places to 10-15 miles and elsewhere contracts to considerably less than 1 mile. In the passage of the river through the Jebel Selima below Assuan it is confined to a gorge measuring only 6 1/2 feet in width. The Nile in this section of its course is nowhere more than 3200 feet wide. Lower Egypt is bounded seaward by the great sand flats and reefs which constitute the outer border of the Delta, and through which the two main arms of the Nile the Rosetta and the Damietta branches, find their way to the sea. Behind these flats on which are situated Alexandria (on the west) Rosetta, Damietta, and Port Said (on the east) are a series of irregular brackish lakes or swamps, — Mariut (or Marcuto) Abuks, Edku Baris and Menahel the largest,—which at times receive the flood discharge from the Nile. The length of this Delta region measured from near Cairo to a point near Cape Baris, is 115 miles its east and west extent is 100 miles. Throughout nearly its entire extent it is traversed by numerous channels and canals, whose aridness, before the construction of the huge regulating works on the Nile caused widespread destruction over the land. For the characteristic of the Nile region now is that

The extent of the Delta deposits, which represent the sedimental discharge of the Nile and almost entire material brought down by the Blue Nile from the Abyssinian highlands, has not yet been definitely ascertained. The Nile now averages a depth in Egypt of about 1-4 ft. but at Kalyah at the head of the Delta, it increases to about 64 ft. borings made at Zagazig have failed to reach bedrock at a depth of 375 ft. The periodic overflows of the Nile are now held in control and a general level of flow is maintained by the great barrage of the Nile the largest weir in the world, located at HARRAGE, about 13 miles N.W. of Cairo and the great storage basin above Assuan. For the hydrographic characterization of the Nile and Delta regions see NILE.

Climate.—The climate of Egypt is characterized by extreme dryness and is generally healthful and in the upper regions markedly so. An almost cloudless sky, with intense sunlight, is found for weeks or months at a time. At Cairo there is practically no rainfall (about 1½ inches) and even at Alexandria the yearly fall is only 8 inches. Showers formed in the upper air are frequently dissipated before the water reaches the earth. Cairo counts about 250 absolutely clear days during the year. The average annual temperature at Cairo is 58° with a mean of 55° for the coldest month (January), and of 84° for the hottest month (July). The mean temperature for Lower Egypt generally is approximately that of Cairo. Alexandria, whose climate is influenced by the presence of the sea, is somewhat warmer in winter and cooler in summer than Cairo. The extreme of temperature found in the months of January–March and June–August, are 35° (Cairo 31°) and 115° (the extreme heat coming with a breeze of the SE. desert wind known as the Khamsin). In the farther region of the Libyan Desert a temperature of several degrees below the freezing point has been recorded as well as an upper maximum of 122° in Cairo the temperature rarely rises even in the hot months above 95–98°. The climate of Upper Egypt, where desert conditions prevail almost exclusively, is much more markedly torrid than in Lower Egypt; the mean winter temperature ranges to 66 and a maximum not rarely to 120°. Owing to the extreme dryness of the atmosphere, by which moisture is almost entirely prevented, malaria is practically unknown even in the region of sluggish waters and overgrown marsh of Egypt has latterly been constituted into a winter and health resort; the country proving particularly beneficial to those suffering from asthmatic, bronchitic and rheumatic troubles. The presence of winter cold winds to an extent interferes with the restorative qualities of those parts particularly that are located not very far from the Mediterranean (Alexandria, Cairo).

Natural Resources.—The soil indigenous flora of Egypt is a restricted one, and necessarily partakes of the character of the desert flora of Africa generally. The date-palm is pre-eminently the vegetable figure of the land, appearing in all the oases and in certain groves along the banks of the Nile, even as far south as Fashode in the Sudan. Its fruit, which ripens in August and September is largely the sustenance of the native population. The branched dum-palm (Hyphantosphaea) also extends far to the south where, on the Upper Nile, it grows in large forests. The commonest of the way-side trees after the palmetto is the vine or thorn tree of antiquity the Acacia Victoriana of botanists. Other vegetal forms are the mulberry carob or St John a bread tamarish and Christ's thorn (Zey-palm). Arboriculture has been extensively practiced during the last half century and the hundreds of thousands of trees that have been planted in and about the cities have largely changed the former dreary aspect of the country and give pleasant shade where before was unobstructed sunshine. Among the introduced trees are the lebbek (Alb zinn Lebbek) conspicuous by its umbrageousness, pinetula, fig and blue-gum or eucaly plus. The papirus and lotus or water lily of the Nile, are characteristic plants of the swamps and open waters.

The cultivated fruits include the grape from which in ancient times much wine was made, pomegranate, orange, lemon, citron, ananias (fig), almond and many of the commoner European fruits. The slender rose (Rosa Damascena), yielding the oil of roses, geranium, sweeten pea, setive etc. are largely cultivated for the beauty of their flowers. Egypt is still generally an agricultural country and although no longer so generally with a white soil, the fertility is still continuous, despite the desert wastes of fertile land which it employs, to produce a surplus crop of wheat, cotton, etc.

barley and durra (oat) are the crops of land under wheat cultivation comprising more than 20 per cent of the entire cultivable area. Cotton introduced from India in 1831 is largely grown in the delta region, while the sugar cane is extensively cultivated more particularly in Upper Egypt. Of the summer crops podded fruit and vegetables are the most important. Egyptian clover, lucerne, banana, papaya, pumpkin, cucumber, melon and many of the common fruits of the Far East are also cultivated. Much of the cultivated land of Egypt requires the aid of mechanical irrigation and the numerous appliances that have been adapted to this purpose (the saqi is a large wheel turned by cattle or buffaloes, sa'if the bucket well etc.) form conspicuous objects in the landscape. The great floods of the Nile reach their maximum with a height of water of about 40 feet in the early part of October, shortly after which the planting of the field begins. There are three agricultural seasons, the winter crop occupying the months from November to April (with the best growth of wheat and barley), the summer crop, the months from April to August (rice cotton) and the autumn crop, August to October (corn, millet). The cultivation of tobacco, which was formerly an important industry, has virtually ceased.

Mineral Resources.—The mineral resources of Egypt are insignificant, and as many of the ancient mines as those yielding emerald in the Jebel Fikreh, copper in the Jebel Fikreh and turquoise at Siwa, in the Siwaite peninsula are no longer worked. The greater part of the land is constructed of Cretaceous Tertiary (nummulitic) and Post-Tertiary limestones which fall off gently northwestward to the Mediterranean and of the more northern Nubian sandstone the age of which has not yet been definitely determined. From this syenitic barrier which near the site of ancient Syene extends to the W for a distance of some 200 miles and precipitates the Nile into the wild desert of Assuan the ancient Egyptians obtained much of their granitic material for the construction of temples, obelisks, etc. The material for the colossal structures of Thebes is the Nubian sandstone which was quarried near Nesebeh; that of the Pyramids and of the substantial building of Cairo, the nummulitic limestone. The so-highly prized green and red porphyries were obtained from the granitic range which borders the Arabian Desert on the side of the Gulf of Suez. Fluvial coral reefs of late Tertiary or Post-Tertiary age, occur on the channel of the Red Sea, as near Koweit at a height of 800-900 feet. The petrified forest near Cairo is one of the geological curiosities of the land.

Amelops Le—The indigenous fauna of Egypt is pre-eminently of the African type, but in it is a strong infusion of European elements and is naturally, loosely linked with the fauna of western Asia. It is poor in forms, and many of the species that formerly inhabited the region have been either exterminated or have withdrawn to more distant parts. The lion, which figured extensively in ancient times in lion hunts, and the leopard are now but rarely found outside of the Sudan and the Sinaitic peninsula. The hyena and jackal, and the long-eared foxes, are not uncommon. The elephant, as a wild animal is unknown in Egypt proper and the hippopotamus which at one time descended into the Delta region is no longer met with north of Dongola. Various antelopes and gazelles frequent the desert regions and the ibex and a species of wild sheep inhabit the rocky fastnesses of the Sinaitic peninsula and the Arabian Desert. Among the birds are the Egyptian vulture, sultan bird flamingo ibis, and various grouse, partridges and herons. Poisonous serpents are fairly numerous; the crocodile is now rarely met with in the Nile north of Assuan. The beasts of burden are the ass, horse, and one-humped camel or dromedary, and the buffalo is largely used in farm labor. Neither the camel nor the horse is pictured on the most ancient monuments, the former apparently having been introduced at a comparatively recent period. The rearing of goats and sheep constitutes an important source of wealth to the inhabitants.

Commerce.—Trade is facilitated by an extensive railway system there having been at the beginning of 1902, 1393 miles of state railway and 780 miles of agricultural roads operated by private companies. Khartoum is now in direct railway communication with Cairo. The government telegraph lines extended at the close of 1901 over 2345 miles. The Suez Canal which was opened for navigation in November 1869 has a total length inclusive of its lakes, of 87 miles. The gross tonnage of vessels passing through it in 1900 was 13,099,238. The Nile and the larger canals are navigated by steamers as well as by freight-boats. Egypt has a large trade with the eastern Sudan and other parts of the interior of Africa, and the slave-trade was carried on until virtually wiped out by English influence and effort. Cotton, sugar, pulse, wheat, ivory, gums, oil seeds, and other goods are exported. The value of textile manufactures mainly raw cotton exported in 1901 was £11,402,497 of cereals and vegetables, £2,649,970.

Government.—The government of Egypt is a hereditary monarchy whose head is called the khedive—lord or prince. In addition to khedive of Egypt, this prince styles himself lord of Nubia the Sudan, Kordofan and Darfur. In 1667 the title of khedive was conferred on the viceroy, Ismail Pasha, by the sultan of Turkey and in 1873 full rights of sovereignty were granted, but the khedive pays to Turkey an annual tribute of $3,300,000. The powers of the ruler are absolute, but the public administrative functions are regulated by a council of state. The Egyptian ministry is composed of 6 members whose departments are those of the interior, finance, justice, war, public works and public instruction and foreign affairs. The English financial adviser without whose concurrence no financial decision can be taken has a seat in the council of ministers, without, however, being an executive officer. Through him the English government exercises virtual control over the administration of Egypt. There are a legislative council and a general assembly in part chosen by the people, but their functions are mainly of an advisory nature. Many of the officials, civil and military are of foreign birth, the English predominating. An Englishman who bears the title of minister is at the head of the Egyptian army. Egypt is divided into provinces styled mudirs (the governor being called mudir). There are also several governorships for the more important cities, which have a local administration. The official language is Arabic. The capital of the country is Cairo.

Ancient Remains.—Egypt far surpasses all other countries in the architectural remains of its remote past. The dryness and equability of the climate and the wonderfully substantial and ponderous character of the ruins have aided to preserve them from destruction. Even Moslem superstitions which utterly destroyed nearly every Roman town in North Africa, had not the strength to do more than deface the pyramids and temples of Egypt. Among the more interesting remains are the Pyramids (especially those of Ghizeh) the Sphinx, and the temples of Thebes (Luxor Karnak) Philae Denderah and Edfu. Of even greater interest are the relics of the old Egyptian literature, recorded in hieroglyphs on walls and on papyrus rolls. The translation of these records is unfolding, in a remarkable way not merely the natural annals but also the story of the daily life, the religious beliefs and the philosophic speculations of a wonderful people, one of the earliest to resolve anything like a true civilization. The group of monuments of the sovereigns of ancient Egypt, now in the museum of Cairo is a contribution of the more recent exploration of the land.

Inhabitants.—The population of Egypt is heterogeneous. The old Egyptian race is represented by the Fellahs (in whom there is a great admixture of the blood of invaders and immigrants) and by the Copts. The Fellahs, who constitute the bulk of the population are mainly agriculturists. They speak an Arabic dialect and are Mohammedans. The Copts who are mainly townpeople, speak a language descended from the ancient Egyptian and are Christians, the great bulk of them belonging to the Coptic church. The Arabs constitute an important element in the cities. There are large numbers of Bedouins. The recent development of European civilization has called in many foreigners.—French, Italian, Greek, Maltese, English and German. In 1897 the population (including Nubia) was 9,821,045 of which 112,526 were foreigners (39,175 Greeks). The principal towns are Cairo with a population in 1897 of 570,400, Alexandria, 310,766 (in 1902 estimated at 310,507), Tanta, 57,289 Port Said 42,095 and Suez or Assuet, 42,812.

History.—The period of Egyptian history covered by the inscriptions on the monuments reaches back 4000 or 5000 years before the beginning of the Christian era. The age of the Great Pyramid of Khufu (Cheops) at Ghizeh is between 5000 and 6000 years. The early seat of power was at Memphis in Lower Egypt, which was supplanted by Thebes in Upper Egypt. The period of the greatest power and splendor of Egypt covers about four centuries terminating about 1250 B.C. when the so-called New Empire was under the eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth dynasties. At this time Egypt was mistress of Syria and had close diplomatic relations with Assyria and Babylonia. Among the kings whose military deeds and architectural and engineering works shed lustre upon the Egypt of this period were Thothmes III, Amenhotep III, Seti I, Ramesses II and Ramesses III. The country was conquered by Persia about 527 B.C. Alexander the Great conquered it in 332 B.C. and founded Alexandria, which under the Greek dynasty of the Ptolemies, was long the greatest seat of civilization in the world. The country passed under the sway of Rome in 30 B.C. After the final division of the Roman Empire in A.D. 395 it formed part of the Byzantine Empire.

In A.D. 639-641 the Arabs effected the conquest of Egypt, which under its Mohammedan rulers soon became totally changed. In 1250 the government was seized by the Mamelukes (originally slaves chiefly from the Caucasus hired to military service) who had grown into power by the favor of Saladin. These were subdued by Sulim I, the Ottoman sultan who became master of Egypt in 1517. When in the first half of the eighteenth century the Ottoman empire was hard pressed by Russia and Austria, Egypt again fell under the turbulent sway of the Mamelukes, who continued to retain the sovereign power during the French invasion in 1798. The ambitious viceroy Mehmet Ali overthrew the Mamelukes in 1811. He subjugated the sect of the Wahabites in Arabia, and in 1820-22 he conquered Nubia. He waged war for the possession of Syria (1831-32) which he held for a time. In a second war with the Porte, begun in 1839 he would have made himself master of Constantinople but for the intervention of the European powers. He was forced to give up Syria but was recognized by the sultan as hereditary tributary ruler of Egypt. Subsequent events have been the construction of the Suez Canal the conferring of the royal distinction upon the Egyptian ruler (Ismail Pasha being named khedive in 1867) the wars of conquest in the upper Nile valley and the Sudan the deposition of the khedive Ismail in 1879 and the appointment of his son Tawfik Pasha, as his successor the Anglo-French control (1879-83) the rebellion of Arabi Pasha (1882) the English armed intervention and the overthrow of Arabi the installation of a British control of the finances, bringing in its train the permanent military occupation of the country by the British the revolt of the Mahdists in the Sudan and the re-establishment of Egyptian sway in that region through the British arms in 1898. The present khedive, Abbas Hilmi ascended the throne in 1892.

England, ing-gland (L. Anglia Fr. Angleterre Ger. England It. Inghilterra Sp. Inglaterra Port. Inglaterra Rus. Angliya Dan. England Swed. England Dutch Engeland Eng. ing-lant) the southern and larger section of the island of Great Britain between lat. 49° 57' 43" and 55° 43' N. and lon. 1° 44' E. and 5° 42' W. The northern boundary between it and Scotland is constituted by the Solway Firth and the river Sark on the west, the Cheviot Hills in the centre and the river Tweed in the north-east. The boundary with Wales is an irregular N. and S. line which lies (chiefly) somewhat westward of the meridian of 3° W. longitude. Its general shape is that of a triangle, of which the base is the southern coast from Land's End (the most westerly point) to South Foreland, and the apex Berwick. Its most easterly point is Lowestoft Head, and the most southerly Lizard Head in Cornwall. Length, from Portland Bill in Berwick 363 miles greatest breadth from North Foreland to Land's End, 330 miles. The coast-line is irregular being much indented by bays and estuaries, such as the estuaries of the Humber and Thames and the large shallow bay called the Wash on the E coast and the estuary of the Severn (or upper arm of Bristol Channel) the estuaries of the Mersey and Hibble, and Morecambe Bay on the W. The larger waters surrounding England are the North Sea or German Ocean, the British Channel and Strait of Dover separating it from France on the S. and St. George's Channel and the Irish Sea, separating it on the W. from Ireland. Areas (including the inland waters) 50,690 sq. m. with Wales, 58,324 sq. m. With the exception of Belgium, England and Wales constitute the most thickly peopled country in Europe, the average to a square mile at the last census having been about 335. In 1801 the population of England and Wales was 8,892,736. In 1851 it was 13,800,797. In 1901 20,685,224. In 1801 29,062,526 and in 1901 32,537,643. The population of England alone in 1901 was

30,807,943. The following is a table of the ancient counties of England and Wales, with their population in 1901

Since 1888 considerable changes have been made in the administrative divisions, mainly through the creation of a large number of county boroughs (municipal counties) whose areas range between 2½ and 48 sq. m. Lincolnshire has been divided into 3 administrative divisions, called the Parts of Holland, Kesteven and Lindsey. Suffolk has been divided into East and West Suffolk and Sussex into East and West Sussex. The Soke of Peterborough has been set off from Northamptonshire. The Isle of Wight, formerly included in Hampshire has been constituted a separate administrative county. The county of London (not including the whole of the metropolis) has been constituted out of portions of Middlesex, Surrey, Essex and Kent.

The following cities had a population exceeding 200,000 in 1901: London (the capital), Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Bristol, Bradford, West Ham (included in the police district of London), Hull (Kingston upon Hull), Nottingham, Salford, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Leicester.

Face of the Country.—The surface of England is mountainous in the N. and W. The Cheviot Hills form the greater part of the boundary between the county of Northumberland and Scotland. The Pennine Chain, a very rugged highland with elevations in most places not exceeding 1000 feet, extends southward from the neighborhood of the river Tyne to nearly the middle of the country and is sometimes referred to as the Backbone of England. The highest elevation of these uplands is Cross Fell in Cumberland, 2892 ft. To the Pennine Chain belongs the picturesque region of Derbyshire known as the Peak, which rises in the Kinder Scout to a height of 2983 ft. The loftiest elevations of all England are the Cumbrian Mountains, in which is situated the famous Lake District. The highest summits here are Ben Fell (or Scafell) Pike, 3210 ft., Sca Fell, 3162 ft., Helvellyn, 3116 ft., and Skiddaw, 3058 ft. Moderately high and rugged elevations are found in the SW. in Cornwall and Devonshire, the Ycs Tor NW of Dartmoor rising to about 2660 ft. The E. and SE. are comparatively low, the surface rarely rising above 500 ft. Around the Wash is a large area of low-lying alluvium, a portion of which is known as the Bedford Level. The E. of England is largely occupied by rolling country which towards the coast constitutes the series of downs partially underlain by chalk and known as the North Downs and South Downs.

Few of the rivers of England have any great length but many even the minor ones are of commercial importance. The principal streams are the Thames, Severn, Trent, and Ouse (tributaries of the Humber River or estuary), Mersey, Tyne, and Tees. All of these streams are connected by canals, forming an extensive system of intercommunicating waters. The lakes of England are restricted chiefly to the NW. Among the best known are Windermere, on the borders of Lancashire and Westmorland and Derwentwater in Cumberland. The lakes, with the surrounding mountainous, form the most attractive scenery of the interior of the land. The rock shore-line of Cornwall and Devon has long been famous for its scenic aspects, which are also shared in part by the chalk cliffs between the Isle of Wight and Dover.

The climate of England is of an insular nature, characterized by moderate extremes of temperature and by a pronounced humidity. Its broad features are those of the climate of the British Isles generally where the average temperature for the year is about 48°. The warmest month is generally July with an average temperature of about 64° at London. The winter is ordinarily mild, with January as the coldest month, the average temperature at London being about 39°. The rainfall is in some parts—as in the Lake District, in Cornwall and in Devon—high ranging to 60–80 inches and upward in the valley of the Thames it is but 25 inches. Fogs are very frequent. The snowfall is ordinarily not very heavy. For Geology, Fauna and Flora, see GREAT BRITAIN.

Mineral Resources.—About three-quarters of the entire mineral production of the United Kingdom is furnished by England, the major values being those obtained from coal, iron-ores, building-stones, clays, salt, tin and lead. Copper, arsenic, zinc, gypsum, heavy-spar etc. are found in minor quantities. The coal measures occupy parts of a large number of the counties, from the south through the west and west-centre to the extreme north. In 1902 the coal production of England without Wales was 150,000,000 tons, of which Durham produced 35,000,000 tons, Yorkshire 28,000,000 tons, and Lancashire 24,500,000 tons. Most of the salt of England is obtained in Cheshire in the basin of the Weaver while nearly the whole of the tin product is obtained from the mines of Cornwall. The total value of the mineral product in the year 1902 was £102,222,160.

Manufactures, etc.—England is next to the United States the greatest manufacturing country in the world. The leading industries include the manufacture of textile fabrics (cottons, woollens, silks, carpets), iron and steel products of every kind, machinery, steam-engines and locomotives, iron ships, electrical apparatus, chemicals, pottery and earthenware, clothing, boots and shoes, paper, hosiery, hats, gloves, lace, ale and porter, carriages, and gold- and silver-ware. Among the leading centres of the cotton industry are Manchester (with Salford), Oldham, Preston, Blackburn, Ashton-under-Lyne, Bolton, Bury and Rochdale, all in Lancashire. This industry is also prominent in some of the adjacent counties. Yorkshire is the chief seat of the woolen industry. Huddersfield, Bradford, Leeds and Dewsbury being among the leading centres. Wiltshire produces high-grade woollens. Halifax and Kidderminster in Yorkshire are great centres of the carpet-manufacture. The counties of Derby, Stafford and Chester produce most of the silk the manufacture of which has greatly declined. Drapery, hosiery and Sheffield have long enjoyed a high reputation for their iron and steel manufactures, notably hardware and cutlery. The former produces great quantities of fire-arms, pens, and musical instruments, metallo-ware. Other important seats of the manufacture of metallo products are Wolverhampton, Bradford, Leeds, Bolton, Oldham and Stockton. Newcastle-upon-Tyne is noted for its locomotive, engineering and ordnance works. Birkenhead, Liverpool, Sunderland, Barrow-in-Furness, Stockton-on-Tees, South and North Shields, and Middlesbrough are ship-building ports. Glasgow and Leicester are the chief centres of the linen manufacture and the former produces the so-called Nottingham in this a large scale. The chief seats of the boot- and shoe-industry are Northampton and Leicester. The site of Burton-upon-Trent and the London porters are famous. Straw plaiting is an important industry in the counties of Bedford, Hertford, and Buckingham. The manufacture of pottery is largely a specialty of Staffordshire, the district of the Potteries about Burslem being intimately associated with the name of Wedgwood. England (with Wales) represents 90 per cent. of the total imports and exports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The value of the imports into England and Wales in 1902 was £470,000,000, that of the exports (including foreign and colonial) £210,000,000. The chief seaports of England and Wales are London, Liverpool, Cardiff, Newcastle, Hull, Southampton, Newport, Swansea, Dover and Bristol. The total length of operated railway in England and Wales in 1901 was 15,181 miles of canal, 3167 miles. The Great Manchester Ship Canal opened in 1894, is 36½ miles in length. See GREAT BRITAIN.

Agriculture, etc.—Agriculture has attained high eminence in England and about 25,000,000 acres, or 76 per cent. of the full area of the land, are under crop-cultivation or in grass-lands, and only about 4,000,000 acres (about 12 per cent.) remain absolutely uncultivated. The heath and grazing country comprises 2,360,000 acres. Wheat is the principal crop, especially in the E and SE counties, and in 1906 staple cultivation covered 1,744,666 acres; barley which is cultivated but little less extensively than wheat, is raised chiefly in the central counties and east in the N though cultivated more or less in all parts of the country. Peas, beans, potatoes, and turnips are the crops next in importance. Rye and buckwheat are not extensively cultivated, rape, flax, hemp and mangel-wurzel are raised only in certain parts. Hops are nearly confined to Kent, Herefordshire, Surrey, Sussex and Worcestershire, the number of acres under this crop being about 50,000. The total acreage under cultivation in Great Britain chiefly in England with green crops was in 1901 3,129,198 with corn-crops, 7,151,708. Near the large towns the ground is commonly laid out in market-gardens, and in Bedfordshire an extensive district is appropriated to growing vegetables for the London market. In the NW counties large quantities of apples are grown and Devon and Hereford are famous for cider. Butter is an important product in Essex (and bridgwater), and Dorset cheese in Cheshire, Gloucester, Wiltshire, Somerset, etc. The Durham or short horned Devon Hereford Jersey and Alderney are the most noted breeds of cattle. The annual product of wool is very large. Swine are very generally kept, and are especially numerous in the forest-lands of Hampshire, Berkshire, Gloucester and Hereford. Geese are raised largely, especially in the Lincoln fens, for the London market. For the various statistics dealing with the products, etc. of the British Isles see GREAT BRITAIN.

England is much less wooded than most of the countries of continental Europe. Only about 1,656,666 acres or barely more than 5 per cent. of the total area, remain in woodland. Of the royal forest lands some of the largest are the New Forest in Hampshire, the forests of Epping (Essex), Sherwood (Kent) and Dean (Gloucester). Many parts of the wealds of Sussex, Surrey and Kent have remained wooded ever since the time of the Romans. England is largely engaged in the fisheries; the value of the fish product (inclusive of that of Wales) for the year 1901 having been upward of £8,500,000 estimated on a catch of nearly 400,000 tons.

Religion and Education.—The established church of England is the Protestant Episcopal to which the great mass of the people belong. The sovereign is the head of the Anglican Church having the right to nominate bishops and archbishops. The church is governed by 2 archbishops and 33 bishops, besides a number of suffragan and assistant bishops and has about 14,000 parishes or benefices, in each of which there is a church presided over by a rector or vicar who holds the living. The Anglican archbishops are those of Canterbury and York. The archbishop of Canterbury is primate and metropolitan of all England and crowns the monarch. The archbishop of York is styled primate and metropolitan of England and crowns the queen-consort. The doctrines of the church are embodied in the Thirty Nine Articles, and having been ratified by Parliament cannot be changed without its consent. The most numerous dissenting bodies are the Wesleyan Methodists, Congregationalists and Baptists. The Roman Catholics (including those of Wales) number about 1,500,000 with 15 (in 1901) chapels and stations. The highest dignitary of the Roman Catholic church is the archbishop of Westminster.

At the head of the educational system of England stand the ancient national universities of Oxford and Cambridge, two of the most celebrated institutions in the world. They are almost exclusively for the wealthier classes, and till a comparatively recent period, were only for members of the Church of England. Prominent among the institutions of learning are the universities of London and Durham. Kings College, London, Victoria University, Manchester and the Birmingham University. Besides these there are numerous theological colleges or seminaries attached to most of which are professors in the faculties of arts and philosophy. There are many colleges and institutions for imparting professional or technical training. At the head of these stands the South Kensington School and Museum with the Art Museum, the India Museum and various science collections, and extensive art and science libraries. The Royal College of Physicians and the Royal College of Surgeons (London) are world renowned as are also the School of Mines (now the Royal School of Mines) the Royal Institution and the Royal Academy. All of these, together with many other colleges and technical schools, are in London. There are royal military academies at Woolwich and Sandhurst, a naval royal college at Greenwich, and an agricultural college at Cirencester.

At the head of secondary education stand the great public schools,—notably Eton, Harrow, Rugby and Marlborough. These schools are richly endowed and have long had a high repute for classical training. For the middle classes there are numerous grammar-schools and private seminaries. Bedford College, London, and the Royal Holloway College, at Egham, are exclusively for female students. Unattached university colleges for women are Newnham and Girton Colleges at Cambridge, and Lady Margaret Hall and Somerville College, at Oxford.

Government.—See GREAT BRITAIN

History.—England (together with the southern portion of Scotland) was known to the ancients as Britannia. The ancient inhabitants, the Britons, were a Celtic people. Caesar made two warlike expeditions to Britain in 55 and 54 B.C. and a century later the conquest of the country was undertaken by the Emperor Claudius. In A.D. 43 Agricola advanced the Roman frontiers to the Firth of Forth the country to the N of which (called now the highland region of Scotland) retained its independence. The Romans introduced their civilization into Britain which they held till the beginning of the fifth century when they were compelled to withdraw their legions. About the middle of the fifth century the Britons called upon the Teutonic peoples dwelling, about the mouth of the Elbe and in Jutland—Saxons, Angles and Jutes—for aid in repelling the invasions of the Picts and Scots living north of Hadrian's wall. After clearing the country of these northern invaders the Germans turned upon the Britons themselves and occupied most of their country driving them out or exterminating them. The Jutes founded the kingdom of Kent, the Saxons, the kingdoms of Sussex, Wessex and Essex, the Angles, the kingdoms of Northumbria, East Angles, and Mercia, Northumbria extending as far N as the Firth of Forth. The ancient Britons were left only Wales (Cornwall, Cumberland and the southwest of Scotland). Alaric, King of Wessex, became overlord of all England. In 1066, the first time in the seventh century, all the land had become Christian mainly through the labors of St. Augustine and of Irish and Scottish missionaries. In the second half of the ninth century the Danes (Northmen) conquered Northumbria, East Angles, and Mercia. The early part of the reign of Alfred the Great (871-901) was marked by continual and ultimately successful struggles against these invaders. Alfred established order on the basis of constitutional law and exerted himself to civilize his subject. In 1013 Sweyn, King of Denmark made himself master of England. His son Canute reigned after him and was followed by his two sons. In 1042 the English people returned to their native royal dynasty under Edward the Confessor. In 1066 William Duke of Normandy invaded England and achieved its conquest by his victory at Hastings. He distributed much of the land of England among his Norman followers while Norman French became the language of the court, of law proceedings, and of the school. A hundred years later under Henry II the first of the Plantagenets (with whose accession in 1154 a large part of France was united with England) the conquest of Ireland was begun. Under John the brother and successor of Richard Coeur de Lion, England lost nearly all her French dominions. In 1215 the barons extorted from John the Magna Charta which has been styled the charter of English liberties. Edward I signified his reign by the conquest of Wales (1277-83) and he struggled strenuously and almost successfully to establish the supremacy of England over Scotland. At Bannockburn (1314) King Robert Bruce overwhelmed the army of Edward II and established the independence of Scotland. In 1344, under Edward III, began the wars of the English for the conquest of France. After a struggle of over a hundred years, in the course of which the French kingdom was brought to the verge of dissolution the tide of war turned and by 1551 the English had been dispossessed of their conquests with the exception of the town of Calais which remained in their hands a century longer. Under Henry VIII the second king of the Tudor dynasty (1509-47) England broke away from Rome, and under Elizabeth (1558-1603) Protestantism was firmly established. The title of King of Ireland was formally assumed by Henry VIII in 1542. With the reign of Elizabeth begins England's career as a great colonializing power. In 1601 the crowns of England and Scotland were united under the Stuarts, and in 1707 the two kingdoms were united into the single realm of Great Britain. In 1714 the House of Hanover (Brunswick) ascended the throne, and for more than a century Hanover was united with England. In 1759-60 (and so was created from the French and simultaneously the English laid the foundations of their empire in India. A little later the colonies which had been planted by the English in America made themselves independent. The legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland dates from 1801. The first half of the nineteenth century witnessed the establishment of British dominion in South Africa, the rise of the Australian colo-also, and the extension of British dominion in India westward to the Indus. In the second half of the century England established her sway over a considerable part of Africa and annexed the kingdom of Burma.

Esquimaux, de-ke-mó or de-he-mó, now more generally written Eskimos (the eaters of raw flesh) the present inhabitants (chiefly of Arctic America and Greenland) consisting of three principal stocks—the Aleuts, better known by the name of Gretnelanders, the Esquimaux proper on the N. and E. coast of Labrador and the western Esquimaux found along Hudson Bay and the N. side of Baffin Bay, the polar abodes of America as far as the mouths of the Coppermine and Mackenzie rivers, and on both the American and Asiatic sides of Herring Strait. This is a locality gives them the remarkable peculiarity of being the only indigenous race common to the Old and the New World. Their physical peculiarities are a stunted stature although many male individuals attain a height of nearly or quite 6 feet, flattened nose projecting cheek bones, thick lips, eyes often oblique, and yellow and brownish skin. In summer they live in skin tents (tipis) in winter they construct stone and ice houses (igloos or igloos). Their chief dependence for food is on fishing particularly on that of the seal. Their weapons are bows and arrows and spears or lances generally pointed with stones or bone but a few frequently with metal. Their language consists of long compound words and has regular though remarkable inflections in grammatical structure at least it is American. In intellect they are by no means deficient, and the success of the Danish missionaries proves their capability of receiving Christianity and understanding its truths and conforming to its precepts. The Esquimaux of Greenland number some 12,000-15,000 in the Danish possessions those beyond Melville Bay or Cape York the true Greenlanders or Arctic Highlanders hardly exceed 900. Their habitations or remains have been found no far north as the 80th parallel of latitude. Ethiopia, a-lee-o-pe-a (L. ἠθιοπία Gr. ἠθιοπία Aithiopia) the name given by the ancient geographers to the countries S. of Egypt the land of Cush of the Bible. It was often vaguely applied to the whole of Africa from the Red Sea to the Atlantic Ocean or to speak more correctly as far W. as the knowledge of the ancients extended. So great was the power of the ancient Ethiopians that more than once in its history Egypt was governed by Ethiopian kings while the most powerful kings of Egypt do not seem at any time to have acquired a permanent hold upon Ethiopia. The most celebrated seat of power was Meroë the ruins of which are to be seen on the Nile, not far above the influx of the Atbara. The kingdom of Meroë existed down to about the beginning of the Christian era. In later times the name of Ethiopia is same to designate the Christian kingdom in Abyssinia, whose capital was Axum which developed into the modern kingdom of Abyssinia still styled Ethiopia in the parlance of the court. The Ethiopian language, a Semitic tongue commonly known as Gees, has long been a dead language, its use being still retained however in the Abyssinian Church.

Etnea, e-tee-a (L. Ætna Sicilian Montebello montebello is a corruption of the Greek ἠθιοπία mountain of the Ethiopians) a volcano in the N.E. of Sicily near the coast and within a short distance of Catania. The loftiest summit is in lat. 1 43' N. lon. 15° E. and is as determined by measurement made in 1891 10 35 feet above sea-level. The base covers an area of nearly 90 miles in circumference, and is a vast crater by the rivers Alcantara and Simeto, the sea marking its limits on the E. The dimensions of the crater have varied considerably but at this time appear to be about 1 10 feet in greatest width with a depth of 495 feet. Although, when viewed from a distance, Etnea presents a very symmetrical cone it is found on a nearer approach to have no exceedingly diversified surface and to be attuned on its flanks by numerous minor cones. The great retreating cone at the summit of which is the principal crater rises from an irregular plain 9 miles in circumference and about 1100 feet below the summiting point. About 80 eruptions of Etnea are recorded in history the earliest being in the year 484 B.C. The more remarkable ones of later period are those of 1169 (when Catania was in greater part destroyed) 1522 1669 1693 1742 1812 1819 1912 1843 1852 1860 1879 1880 and 1892 a new crater being opened in the last named year near Monte Giacellaro. The eruption of 1792 continued for a whole year the streams of lava which flowed from the mountain on that occasion were often 30 feet high while in their fluid state. In the eruption of 1837 numerous craterlets opened in the sides of the mountain from which in the midst of violent explosions and tremendous discharges of ash and cinders, issued a stream of lava 18 miles in length 1 mile broad and 30 feet high. The eruption of 1649 hurled its lava into Catania, a part of which it destroyed. The eruption of 1693 with its accompanying earthquakes, is said to have cost the lives of upward of 60 000 people. At the foot of the cone of Mount Etnea, 96.2 feet above the sea, is the Cava Etnea or Observatorio, affording accommodation to tourists. This house is covered with snow till the middle of June, and fresh snow falls on it in August. An interesting geological feature of the volcano is the Vai or Valle del Bove, an amphitheatre about 3 miles in length and flanked by cliffs 3000-4000 feet high. Considerable snow rests throughout the year on the summit of the volcano the slopes of which up to a great height are wooded with oak beech chestnut, and pine—Adj. Etnean Etnean (L. Ætnæ).

Euphrates, yū frā-tēs (Gr Euphrates Turk Frāt frāt) a river of Asiatic Turkey has its sources in two principal branches in about 40° N lat. and between 41° 30' and 42° 55' E lon. The Mndā-rū its easternmost and largest branch has its origin in the Armenian highlands near the meridian last named while a smaller branch the Kura-Su rises 70 or 80 miles farther W in the same region about 24 miles NE of Erzerum These main confluent units near Reban-Maden about lat. 38° 30' N and lon 38° 30' E and thence the river takes the name of Euphrates The general course of the two principal affluents before their union, as well as that of the main river is SW to within about 90 miles of the Gulf of Iskanderun. Thence it takes a general southeastern course, which it preserves till it discharges its waters into the Persian Gulf, after a course of about 1800 miles from the head-waters of the Murad-Su. The latter river of itself has a course of over 300 miles before its junction with the Kara-Su. For about 880 miles from their sources the Euphrates and its upward tributaries flow through a mountainous country. At Hit, in lat. $33^{\circ} 38' N$ and lon. $42^{\circ} 42' E$ the country begins to be level, and both above and below this town ancient irrigating aqueducts of costly construction diverge from the main stream. The Euphrates is 120 yards in width a little below the junction of its two main branches. Its general breadth varies from 200 to 400 and even 800 yards, but the river narrows (owing to the numerous canals for irrigation) below Hilla (near the site of ancient Babylon), and where we enter the almost stoneless lower plain) to 160, 120 and even 60 yards in width. It receives the Tigris in about $31^{\circ} N$ lat and $47^{\circ} 29' E$ lon. The salted stream which takes the name of Shat-el Arab expands to nearly half a mile in breadth, and for the last 40 miles to even greater dimensions. The general depth of the upper Euphrates exceeds 8 feet, and between the influx of the river Khabur and the town of Basra, on the Shat-el Arab the depth ordinarily varies from 8 to 21 feet (although much exceeding this in places) the shallows being in low water parts of the river in the marshes once forming the Chaldean Lake, where the Euphrates separates into two branches from which smaller ones and numerous irrigating cuts diverge. Below Basra the depth increases to 30 feet, and in some places to 40 feet or more. The current varies from 2 to 4 miles an hour at high water. The Euphrates is navigable without serious interruption from Birejik to the sea, a distance of over 1100 miles, and is rarely flooded down even above Birejik. There are, however, some obstructions to navigation at low water caused by ledges of rocks. Steamers of 500 tons ascend the Shat-el Arab regularly to Basra, and those of the Tigris fleet to Hilla (en route to Bagdad) at the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris. The quantity of water discharged by the Shat-el Arab is computed to be about 240,000 cu. feet per second. The principal tributary of the Euphrates between the Kara-Su and the Tigris is the Khabur entering on the E. See Tigris.

The flooding of the Euphrates is caused by the melting of the snow in the mountains along the upper part of the course. This takes place about the beginning of March and increases gradually up to the end of May. The river continues high and very rapid for 30 or 40 days, but afterwards decreases daily until it reaches its lowest in September and October. The increment of land about the delta has been found to be a mile in 30 years. The region between the Euphrates and the Tigris on the E. is ancient Mesopotamia.

Eupora, yu-pu-rah, a banking post town of Webster co., Miss. 6 miles SW of West Point, on the Southern R. Pop. in 1900 724.

Eurasia, a geographic term for the united continental divisions of Europe and Asia.

Eure, ra (anc. Elura and Antauri) a river of France, rises in the department of Orne, flows NE through the departments of Eure-et-Loir and Eure, and joins the Seine on the left above Pont de l'Arche. Its chief affluent is the Iton on the left. Its length is 112 miles for 90 of which it is navigable.

Eure, a department in the NW of France forming part of the old province of Normandy situated on the estuary of the Seine. Area, 2530 sq m. The climate is mild and humid, the surface is generally flat. The chief rivers are the Seine, its affluents, the Eure, Rille, and Andelle, and the Iton, an affluent of the Eure. Wheat, oats, flax, sugar beets, etc. are extensively cultivated; apples and pears are important crops; pasture is extensive. The manufactures include woollens, cotton, paper, etc. Capital, Evreux. Pop. in 1901 334,781.

Eure, a post hamlet of Gates co. NC. Pop. 58.

Eure-et-Loir, ur-e-lw-ah, a department in the NW of France, forms part of the old provinces of Orléanais and Ile-de-France. Area, about 2300 sq m. Its chief rivers are the Eure and Loir. There are many marshes in the W. The climate is mild and temperate, the soil is extremely fertile, and a great amount of cereal grain is raised. Here excellent cavalry horses are reared, and numerous cattle, sheep and poultry. Capital, Chartres. Pop. in 1901 275,453.

Eureka, yu-roo'ka, a county in the north-central part of Nevada, is intersected by the Humboldt River. Area, 4111 sq m. The surface is partly mountainous. Here are rich mines of silver and lead. Capital, Eureka. Pop. in 1890, 3275; in 1900 1264.

Eureka, a post-village of Talladega co., Ala., on the Chocologee Creek, 10 miles NW of Talladega.

Eureka, a banking city and the capital of Humboldt co., Cal. on Humboldt Bay about 3 miles E of the Pacific Ocean and 7 miles NE of the entrance to the bay. It is about 215 miles (direct) NW of Sacramento, on the Eureka and Klamath and the Klam River and Eureka R. It has extensive lumber mills, a foundry and machine-shop, a brewery, tanneries, woollen mills, etc. Steamboats run regularly to San Francisco, 240 miles distant. Eureka has a mild and squally climate. It is surrounded by mountains and forests of redwood trees, which attain an enormous size. It has a safe harbor separated from the ocean by a very narrow tongue of land, and with the minimum depth of water of about 24 feet. Large quantities of redwood are exported from this place to San Francisco, Hawaii, Australia, etc. Pop. in 1890 4868; in 1900 7327.

Eureka, a post-village of San Juan co., Colo. 5 miles N by E of Silverton. Pop. in 1900 39.

Eureka, a post-village of Marion co., Fla. about 75 miles S by W of Jacksonville. Pop. 150.

Eureka, a post-village of Dooly co., Ga. 15 miles SW of Maconville.

Eureka, a banking city of Woodford co., Ill. 20 miles E of Peoria, on the Atchafalaya, Peoria and Santa Fé and the Toledo, Peoria and Western Rrs. It is the seat of Eureka College, which was founded in 1855 and is a shipping point for grain and live-stock. Pop. in 1900 1081.

Eureka, a post-village of Spencer co., Ind. 10 miles W of Rockport. Pop. about 125.

Eureka, a post-village of Adams co., Iowa 9 miles N of Corning.

Eureka, a banking city capital of Greenwood co., Kan. on the Fall River and on the Atchafalaya, Peoria and Santa Fé and the Missouri Pa. Rr. 48 miles E of Emporia. The Southern Kansas Academy is located here. It is a shipping point for grain and produce. Pop. in 1900 7091.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Lyon co., Ky. 7 miles W of Eddyville.

Eureka, a post-village of Kennebec co., Me. Pop. 115.

Eureka, a post-village of Clinton co., Mich. 9 miles N of St. John. Pop. about 200.

Eureka, a post-village of St. Louis co., Me. on the Marquette River 30 miles W of St. Louis. Pop. 150.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Hayes co., Neb.

Eureka, a banking post-village capital of Eureka co., Nev. is 65 miles E of Austin on the Eureka and Salt Lake R. It has rich mines of gold, silver and lead, and has smelting and refining works. Pop. about 1000.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Sullivan co., N.Y.

Eureka, a post-town of Wayne co., N.C. The bank is at Goldsboro. Pop. in 1900 123.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Clinton co., Ohio.

Eureka, a post-village of Montgomery co., Pa. 2 miles N of Philadelphia.

Eureka, a banking city of McPherson co., S. Dak. 25 miles from Roseau, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. It is a shipping point for grain. Pop. in 1900 981.

Eureka, a post-village of Navarro co., Tex. 13 miles E of Corsicana.

Eureka, a banking city of Juab co., Utah 85 miles S of Salt Lake City on the Oregon Short Line and the Rio Grande Western R. It has mines of copper, gold and silver, smelting works and quartz mills. Pop. in 1900 1085.

Eureka, a post-village of Wallawalla co., Wash. 17 miles N by W of Wallawalla.

Eureka, a post-village of Winnebago co., Wis. on the Fox River about 16 miles W of Oshkosh is a banking point. Pop. about 350.

Eureka, a post-village of Princeton co., Nove Scotia on the Intercolonial R. The banking point is Stellarton or New Glasgow.

Eureka Creek, a gold-bearing creek of the Klondike region of the Yukon district of Canada, tributary to the Indian River.

Eureka Mills, Flamm co., Cal. See JOHNSVILLE.

Eureka Mills, a post-hamlet of Charlotte co., Va.

Eureka Mouth, a village and gold mining camp of Nevada co., Cal. 24 miles NE of Nevada City. Pop. about 200.

Eureka Springs, a banking city and watering place capital of Carroll co., Ark. on the St. Louis and Northern Arkansas R. 85 miles SW of Springfield, Mo. It is beautifully situated among the Ozark Mountains, and has mineral waters for which it is celebrated. Pop. in 1900 3572.

Euripus, yu-ri-pus, the narrowest part of the channel separating Xobos from the main land of Greece. It is at one place little more than 100 feet wide. Its remarkable tidal currents have been noticed from early times.

Euron, a post-town of Victoria, Australia, 35 miles by rail N by E. of Melbourne. Pop. about 1300.

Europa, a small island claimed by France, in the Mosambique Channel. Lat. 23° 19' S.

Europe, yurōp (Gr. Εὐρώπη, Eurōpē; Y. Kuro'pa) a continent or semi-continent of the eastern hemisphere constituting the western division of the grand-division now generally recognized by geographers as Eurasia (Europe-Asia). It consists of a main land and of a number of larger and smaller islands that constructionally or politically belong to it, as Great Britain and Ireland, Iceland, Nova Zembla, the Faroe Islands, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, the Balares and Grecian Islands etc. The extreme points of the main land are the North Cape, on the island of Magerö, in the N. in lat. 71° 12' N. Cape Tarifa or the Punta Marroquí in the S. lat. 35° 58' N. the Cabo da Roca, in the W. in lon. 9° 30' W. and a point in the Ural Mountains in about lon. 66° 8' E. Its N. and E. extent the main land traverses 35 degrees of latitude or about 2400 miles. Its N.E. and S.W. extent is very much greater. The British Isles are planted upon an oceanic platform which is covered in most parts by but an insignificant depth of water and have until a recent geological period been united with the continental main. The separation from Africa by the Strait of Gibraltar is also a late geological occurrence as is likewise that from Asia (Asia Minor) by the Dardanelles and Bosporus. Nova Zembla is a disrupted portion of the Ural chain extending into the Arctic Ocean. The boundaries of Europe are: in the N. the Arctic Ocean, on the E. Asia, the Ural range constituting a great part of the boundary, and the Caspian Sea, on the S. Asia, the Black Sea and the Mediterranean Sea, on the W. the Atlantic Ocean. The range of the Caucasus is commonly regarded as forming part of the boundary between Europe and Asia but many geographers consider the depression of the Manych about 3 degrees of latitude farther to the N. to be properly the limit of Europe in this quarter. Area about 3,600,000 sq. m.

Relief and General Features of the Land—Europe is the only one of the greater divisions of the globe which lies wholly outside of the tropics and is therefore climatologically tall and seasonally more of a unit than either North America or Asia. Its coast line is more irregular and broadly indented than that of any other of the continents. The large arms or bights of the outer ocean—White Sea, Baltic Sea, North Sea, British Channel, Bay of Biscay, Mediterranean (with its sub-arm the Adriatic Sea)—permeating free ingress points located in the interior and virtually bringing the heart of the country into direct communication with the ocean. This condition has necessarily exerted a marked influence upon the development of the land. The length of the coast line, as measured upon the larger and smaller sinuosity has been estimated at from 20,000 to 40,000 miles. An elevation of the western coast by 150-400 feet would remove the main land with the British Isles and with the outlying "Settled" group and carry the continent to its proper oceanic coast.

In face Relief—Here it is the high mountains Europe has a less general elevation than any of the other continents. Its mean height being probably under 1000 feet. Nearly or quite one-half of the land now at a level less than 600 ft. above the sea, while in some parts as in the Netherlands and the region bordering upon the Caspian Sea, the surface is actually depressed below sea-level at the mouth of the Volga to the extent of fully 80 ft. On the Netherlands west the incursion of the sea is prevented through the construction of gigantic sea-walls or dikes and the inner waters are carried on elevation several feet above the level of the depressed lowland. To the region of lowland belong the greater part of Russia from the Arctic Ocean to the Black and Caspian seas, the North German plain, the central plain of Hungary, the lower Danubian plain and the great plain of northern Italy which represents a northern arm of the Adriatic basin filled in by sediment derived from the Alps.

Mountains—The dominant mountain-chains of Europe almost everywhere define shore-lines, or outward-depressed lowland. The most ancient are probably those of the Scandinavian peninsula, the Apennine-Alps or Pyrenean which find their continuation in the Grentian of northern Scotland, and which bear to the continent at large the same constructional relation that is borne by the Labrador and Laurentian Highlands to the continent of North America. The highest summit is the Yngst Fjeld, which attains an elevation of 8646 feet. The culminating point of this system in the British Isles, and the highest point in this detached portion of Europe, is Ben Nevis, 4406 feet, which stands on the southern side of the great rift, the glacially formed Glen More, which with its deep lakes (Ness, Lochy, Lochy) and the Caledonian Canal separates the NW from the SE. Highlands. The most imposing of the European mountains, if we assume the Caucasus to be entirely Asiatic, are those of the great Alpine system, which constructionally or orographically are composed of the Alps proper, the Apennines, Carpathians, Balkans, and some of the southern mountains of Spain. The Alps proper as generally recognized begin near Savona, NW of Genoa, and sweep in a vast curve of 700 miles length along the frontiers of Italy and France and through Switzerland and southern Germany into Austria, terminating a short distance westward of the Austrian capital. They cover an area of approximately 60,000 sq. m. Being of comparatively recent formation dating their final uplift from the Tertiary period they exhibit those marked features of ruggedness and abruptness which are ordinarily absent from mountains of great age and which have given to them aspects of grandeur that are hardly to be matched elsewhere on the globe. The loftiest summit of the Alps and of all Europe (not here considering the Caucasus) is Mont Blanc, on the confines of France and Italy 15,782 feet in height. Other summits are Monte Rosa, 15,217 ft., the Dom 14,842 ft., Weisshorn 14,804 ft., Matterhorn, 14,790 ft., Finsteraarhorn 14,026 ft., Jungfrau, 13,610 ft., etc.

The Apennines, which constitute the Italian extension of the Alpine system, form the backbone of the Italian peninsula, whence they pass out into Sicily and reappear in the N. of Africa as the Atlas mountains. A branch of this system is again deflected northward through Morocco into the promontory of Tangier and beyond the Strait of Gibraltar in the Sierra Ronda or Sierra Nevada of Spain. The culminating point of the Apennines is Monte Corvo of the Gran Sasso d'Italia, 9585 feet. That of the Sierra Nevada, the Cumbre de Mulhacén 11,470 ft. The westerly continuation of the Alps is constituted by the Carpathian mountains which define in great part the deep basin of the central Hungarian plain sweep back as the Transylvanian Alps to the Danube, and beyond that river are continued by the main mountains of the Balkan peninsula. The highest summit is the Gerlachkofel Spitz, 8737 ft. with the Lomnitzer Spitz, Schlegelkofel Spitz, Neugegen Spitz, etc. as subordinate summits. The highest summit of the Balkan chain proper has an elevation of about 7800 ft. The mountains which extend southward from the Balkan range attain an elevation of nearly 10,000 ft. (Rila high). Another and more direct offshoot of the Alps is constituted by the mountains which define the eastern borders of the Adriatic Sea (Dinaric Alps etc.) and are prolonged through Greece, giving to it its dominant lines of relief into the island of Crete.

The Pyrenees, which form the boundary between Spain and northwestern France, and their western continuation the Cantabrian mountains seem geologically to be a part of the Alpine system although the relation is not quite so clear. The culminating point is the Pic de Néthou (Aneto) 11,165 feet. Central Spain consists largely of a vast ancient plateau the meseta which like parts of central and southern France, southern Germany and western Austria constituted one of the primary bulwarks of the continent, receiving the impacts which were forced to it in the construction of the later mountains. It has only in a recent period been drained of the lacustrine waters which covered its surface as a relief of an oceanic transgression. Of the minor mountains of west central Europe should be mentioned the Harz, Voges, Jura, Black Forest, Thuringian Forest, Ore Mountains, Bohemian Forest, and the Mont Tains with elevations nowhere exceeding 500 ft. (Crêt de la Vierge, Mont Reculet in the Jura) and usually falling below 400 ft. The remaining important mountains of the semi-continent are the ancient and largely degraded Ural, on the eastern border which attain their last out point in the Tselin 5576 ft. The Caucasus, lying south of the Manych depression which are assumed by some geographers to form the true physical boundary between Russia and Asia on the SE. and probably can be traced through the Tula mountains of the Crimea to the eastern Balkans contain summits loftier than the highest of the Alps such as the volcanic peaks Elbrus (upwards of 18,000 feet) and Kazbek and several other summits which considerably exceed Mont Blanc in elevation. For a more detailed account of the mountains of Europe see the notices of the different mountain-chains and of their individual peaks and of the different countries in which the mountain masses Mountain Passes—All the main mountain masses of Europe are traversed by more or less serviceable road passes, some of which attain a great altitude. Such are the pass of Roncesvalles in the western Pyrenees (the Col du Tour du Mont Cenis (close to which is the tunnel of the Mini Cenis railway), Little St. Bernard (7176 feet), Great St. Bernard (8110 ft.), Simplon (6590 ft. beneath which is the Simplon railway tunnel), St. Gotthard (6915 ft. with the near-by St. Gotthard railway-tunnel 54 miles in heat from the north of Africa. 2, the oceanic or west European—the region between France and southern Norway 3, the Baltic 4, the subarctic dominating the region north of the Arctic Circle and characterized in most parts by winters of extreme severity and 5 the Pontane or east-central which is largely that of west-central Asia. The highest annual temperature of all Europe is seemingly found at Malta, 66° F. being about 5° warmer than at Constantinople and 4° higher than at Gibraltar. At Archangel in lat 63 33' N. where the January temperature is about —7° the temperature for the year is approximately that of freezing. This town has nearly the lowest yearly temperature in Europe, although the winter cold is fully equalled at Kazan about 600 miles farther to the south and nearly so at Moscow. London and Paris enjoy almost identical climatic temperatures measured by the mean for the coldest (January 35°–38°) and warmest (July 64°–60°) months, and by the average for the year (50°). The extremes are however much greater at Paris where the temperatures of 104° and —23° have been recorded. The average annual temperature of some of the more important cities is as follows: Stockholm 41°, St. Petersburg 32°, Edinburgh 47°, Warsaw 45°, Vienna, 50°, Geneva 49°, Barcelona, 65°, Rome 60° and Athens 63°.

The quantity of rainfall is very variable being largest on the oceanic and Mediterranean borders. Over a large part of the interior the annual precipitation is less than 25 inches. In Austria and Aragon the fall is reduced to 14–16 inches, and at Dunkirk in France it is only 12 inches. Frankfurt-on-the-Main has 19 inches and London despite its very large number of rainy days only 22 inches. On the western edge of the Scottish Highlands the rainfall rises to 80 inches or more an amount nearly equalling that (53 inches) found at Bergen, Norway. At Triunfo, in Italy a fall of 94 inches is annually recorded. In about the December precipitation is about 27 times that of July. In Naples the precipitation is 11 times greater in November than in July and in Rome 10 times greater in October than in July. In Palermo, Sicily it is claimed that not a single drop of rain fell during the month of July in the period of 41 years between 1904 and 1853.

Vegetation.—Three broad floral zones can be recognized for the continent of Europe. 1, the Mediterranean which has strong affiliation with the flora of northern Africa in which trees with fleshy overgreen leaves largely replace those of the ordinary deciduous type and where some of the most distinctive vegetable forms, whether indigenous or introduced and cultivated are constituted by the myrtle, laurel, olive, chestnut, cork oak, pison (or stone-pine), palmetto, date, orange, citron, olive, nopal and agave. 2, the central European or Germanic where the components of the native forest are the ordinary deciduous trees such as the oak, beech, birch, poplar, elm, maple, and willow inter-spaced or alternating in belts with the pine, fir, spruce and larch among evergreens. In this zone, which on the Atlantic coast extends to about the centre of Norway the cereals are extensively cultivated (barley to beyond the 6th parallel of latitude) and 3, the subarctic and Arctic zone which in Russia carries far southward its tundra forests of arctic green and in the north includes the grass and moss tundras of the half-frozen soil. Other distinctive vegetable regions are the heaths of northern Germany and the steppes of southeastern Russia which in their treeless character and wealth of grasses and flowers recall the American prairies.

Animals.—The fauna of Europe is intimately linked with the temperate faunas of both Asia and North America, and forms part of the Holarctic division of zoogeographers. Many of its forms, as the polar bear, elk (or moose), reindeer, wolf, fox, Arctic hare, beaver and other rodents, are also found on the American continent and others are replaced by representative and closely related species. There is no question at this time that a land bridge via Spitzbergen or Iceland and Greenland within a comparatively recent geological period (Middle Tertiary and later) united the two continents and permitted of the transference from one to the other of their faunal parts. Of some of the more distinctive animal types of Europe may be mentioned the European beaver which is now restricted to the forests and the forest preserves of Lithuania, the chamois and ibex of the higher elevations of the Pyrenees, Alps and Carpathians, the muskox or mouflon (big horn) of Corsica and Sardinia, the saiga antelope of the steppes of southern Russia, the axis deer of the Mediterranean region, the rook and stag, and the Alpine and Russian marmots. The jackal is still found in parts of Greece and the Balkan peninsula, and it seems not unlikely that the lion may also have been until recently an inhabitant of Macedonia. The tiger occasionally visits the region of the Caspian Sea. A single species of monkey the Barbary ape, inhabits the rock of Gibraltar, whither it may have been introduced. A number of the south European quadrupeds are also found in the north of Africa, and there can be no question that direct interchanges between the two regions were formerly effected along the lines of Gibraltar and Sicily at a time following or coincident with the Glacial Period when the Mediterranean basin had not yet been fully formed. Fossil elephants have been found in Malta, and the cavern and other deposits of Spain, Italy, Greece, France, England, etc. have brought to light an exceedingly rich fauna made up largely of forms that are to-day considered to be of African (and partially Asiatic) types, such as the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, lion, hyena, jackal, etc. There is no doubt that much of the European fauna is of Asiatic origin. Among the European birds may be mentioned a large number of species of sparrows, warblers and flycatchers, the nightingale, skylark, bullfinch and bee-eater, theammergauer (or bearded vulture) of the Alps, the African vulture, and the bustard of the Russian plains. Europe has only one poisonous serpent, the aspidochelone or viper, there is no large scorpion, but herds of small ones are plentiful more particularly in the Mediterranean region.

Mineral Resources.—The mineral resources of Europe are very extensive, and include gold (extensively mined in the Ural mountains and the Carpathians), silver, platinum (found in the Ural tract alone), tin (principally from Cornwall, England), zinc, lead, copper, mercury (principally mined at Almadén in Spain and Idria in Carniola), iron, rock-salt (the most extensive deposits at Wismutka and Bochnia, in Galicia and Marmaros in Hungary) and coal, the largest deposits of the last named being found in England, the east of France, Belgium, Germany, and south Russia. Iron is very extensively distributed, the best quality coming from Sweden. Mineral springs are numerous, among the best known being those of Vichy, Wiesbaden, Ems, Baden, Baden, Kissingen, Homberg, Schwalbach, Nauheim, Selters, Spa, Karlsbad, Marienbad, Franzensbad, Gastein, Hall, Rottenbach, Tepitz, Buda (Honyadi) and Epsom.

The states of Europe in the order of their area are (the various states of the German Empire not being individually enumerated): Russia, Austria-Hungary, the German Empire, France, Spain, Sweden, Norway (declared independent in 1905), Great Britain, Italy, Turkey, Rumania, Bulgaria, Portugal, Greece, Serbia, Switzerland, Denmark (without Iceland), Belgium, Netherlands, Montenegro, Luxembourg, Andorra, Liechtenstein, San Marino, Monaco. Russia embraces more than half of the total area of Europe. Nearly 8 per cent. belongs to the Scandinavian Peninsula, 7 per cent. is included in Austria-Hungary, Germany, France, and Spain have each a little more than 5 per cent. Great Britain and Italy about 3 per cent. each. The smallest state, Monaco has 5 sq. m. The population of Europe slightly exceeds 400,000,000. Of this figure about one-fourth belongs to Russia, one-seventh to the German Empire, one-eighth to Austria-Hungary, one-tenth to the British Isles, nearly one-tenth to France, one-twelfth to Italy, and a little more than one-twenty, 5th to Spain.

Geography and Language.—Most of the nations of Europe belong linguistically if not by pure descent to the great Indo-European or Aryan stock, of which the principal European branches (as commonly recognized) are the Celtic, Teutonic, Slavic and Graeco-Latin but in the N. & S.E. and centro of Europe are peoples belonging to the Uralo-Altaic stock the chief among them being the Magyars (Hungarians), Finns, and Turks. The Semitic stock is represented by the Jews. In northern Spain and southern France are found the Basques, whose affinities have not been established.

The Celts once possessed the W. of Europe, from the Alps to the British Islands. The only remnant of the western Celtic language, at the present day is the Gaelic or Erse, spoken in some districts of Ireland, the Scotch Highlands, the Isle of Man and the Hebrides. The Cymric Celts are represented by the Welsh and Bretons, who still use their ancient speech. To the Teutonic race belong the Germans, Scandinavians, Dutch, Frisians, Flemings and English. To the E. in general of the Teutonic race though sometimes mixed with it, come the Slavic peoples to whom belong the Russians, Poles, Czechs (Bohemians), Serbians, Croats, Slovaks, Slovenes, Bulgarians, and Montenegrins. In the S. of Europe are the descendants of the peoples who anciently spoke Greek and Latin. The Latin races include the French, Italians, Spaniards and Portuguese. The Rumanians (Wallachs) speak a Rumanian tongue. The Albanians are now considered to be sprung from the Indo-European stem. The gypsies are seemingly of East-Indian origin. The Lithuanians and Letts are allied to the Slavic races. The Finnish race includes the Finns proper, to whom are allied in language, if not in descent, the Lapps, also the Karelians, Samoyeds, Ketchians, and many others.

tribes. The Magyars speak a language closely allied to the Finnish. In many portions of Europe the people are of mixed race. In parts of Germany the peasantry are Slavic in blood but German in language, and in large tracts of Russia the people are Finns Russified in language and religion.

Enkrosas, now called Iri, or'ee, a river of Greece, in the Morea, the principal stream of ancient Laconia, on whose banks stood Sparta. It falls into the Gulf of Laconia. Length 60 miles.

Enrym'edon, in ancient geography a river of Pamphylia, Asia Minor emptying into the Mediterranean Sea. At its mouth the Athenian commander Cimon signally defeated the Persians in 466 B.C. Its modern name is Köprü-Su.

Falkland Islands (Is. Malouines and Is. Juan Fernandez) a group of islands in the South Atlantic Ocean, forming a crown colony of Great Britain, extending altogether of some 200 islands, 249 miles N. E. of Tierra del Fuego between lat. 5° and 53° S. Only two of these islands are of any considerable size. They are named respectively East and West Falkland and are separated from each other by Foul Bay and Sound which is from 14 to 19 miles broad. East Falkland is about 80 miles in length and about 63 miles in breadth. West Falkland is 80 miles long by about 40 miles broad. Choual and 11 ranchman sounds penetrate so deeply into the two sides of East Falkland as nearly to divide it into two parts. The total area is very nearly estimated at 17,000 to 18,000 sq. m. or about 4,000,000 acres. The islands are low and the hills attain a considerable altitude, but the whole of the S. portion is low and lying of morland and black bog intersected by innumerable streams and pools. The soil is generally peat but it supports in various parts shrubby bushes and a coarse grass which affords ample nourishment to cattle. Trees are wholly wanting. Mount Adam on West Falkland, attains an elevation of about 2300 feet. The climate is equable and healthful. The ordinary range of the thermometer is between 30° and 50° in winter and from 60° to 65° in summer with a mean annual temperature of 42°. Rain (yearly fall about 30 inches) and high winds are frequent. The tussock-grass is the most useful plant in the flora of these islands. It covers all the small islands of the group like a forest of miniature palm growing to a height of 10 feet in height and thrives best on the shores exposed to the spray of the sea. Most of the useful kinds of vegetables and green crops can be advantageously cultivated, but fruits and wheat do not ripen.

The rearing of cattle and sheep is the principal industry and hides, tallow and wool are the staple exports. The native mammalian fauna comprises a few closely related to a Putaguian species and a mouse the other forms have been introduced. The wild horses of the islands of which there are thousands are highly thought of. Hens and rabbits are plentiful. The numerous creeks abound in fish. Sea-elephants and seal frequent the shores and whales resort to the surrounding waters though now in greatly diminished numbers. There are no reptiles of any kind in the islands. The principal birds are geese, snipe, ducks, hawks, gulls, albatrosses, gulls, petrels, penguins etc. and a very few land birds. The people are of British and Spanish American descent, for these islands were uninhabited when discovered.

The Falkland Islands were discovered by Davis on Aug. 14, 1592. In 1710 a French vessel from Saint-Malo touched at them and named them Isles Malouines. Settlements were afterwards formed on them by the French, English and Spaniards successively but the English ultimately took possession of them in 1833. The colony has a governor, a judge and other officers, appointed by the crown. There are a few schools and other schools, and education is com-

Fernando Po, or Fernando Póo (as called from the name of its discoverer, Fernão do Po) an island belonging to Spain, in the Gulf of Biafra, western Africa, 20 miles from the main land, between lat 3° 12' and 3° 47' N and lon 8° 26' and 8° 57' E. It is of volcanic origin, 35 miles long and 23 miles broad. The shallow water of less than 300 feet depth which separates it from the continent indicates that the island was until recently a part of the main land, joined to the volcanic group of the Kamerun. Clarence Peak, a magnificent extinct or quiescent cone, rises to 10,190 feet. The whole island is picturesque in the extreme, being covered in the N. part with dense forests and luxuriant vegetation while on the S. some fine park-escapes compensate for a comparative deficiency of trees. The sugar-cane grows in profusion, yams of an unusually good quality are grown in great quantities, and coffee, cotton, tobacco, rice and bananas, together with some simonons are also cultivated. India-rubber and palm oil are exported. The climate is markedly unhealthy although the temperature is not particularly high. The rainfall is 160-125 inches. There are several harbors in the island the most spacious of which is Mandou Bay at the N. and where is situated Clarence Town (Santa Isabel) originally an English settlement, established in 1827. The natives are a peculiar race, the Bubi, different in their physical characteristics and language from their neighbors on the continent. It is a large and well-built town with spacious and regular streets. In the middle of the city is a castle, the Castello (now used as a city bureau) which was once the residence of the dukes. Ferrara has long been falling into decay and has hardly more than mouldering palaces to show as reminders of its golden period. It still contains a vast cathedral dating from the early part of the twelfth century and numerous churches, most of which contain valuable paintings, together with some interesting specimens of sculpture. It has also a public gallery of paintings, called the Palazzo de Diamanti containing many excellent works by the painters of the Ferrara school, a university with a limited number of students, and a public library of 100,000 volumes and 1700 MSS. The latter including some of those of Ariosto and Tasso. The house in which Ariosto lived during his latter years is now national property and is ranked among the national monuments. Another object of interest is the cell in the Hospital of St. Anna in which Tasso was imprisoned. Ferrara is an archbishopric. It carries on some trade in grain, fruit, cattle, and wine, and has manufacturers of silk, hemp, soap, wax, candles, brass, utensils, stoves, glass, etc. Under the famous house of Este the city was the capital of a sovereign duchy and possessed one of the most polished courts in Italy, and a population estimated at more than 100,000. In 1598 it passed into the possession of the pope. In the sixteenth century it was famous for its school of painting, which ranked as one of the first in Italy, and in the sixteenth century it was the asylum of Calvin, Marot, and others. A celebrated council was held at Ferrara in 1438. Pop. in 1831 28,814 in 1901 33,153 (commune 87,648).

- Finland (Finnish, Suomi or Suomenmaa, i. e. land of lakes. L. Finnia, Fennia, Finnlandia) a country of Europe, forming the northwestern corner of the empire of Russia, whose sovereign is grand-duke of Finland. It extends from lat. 60° 48' N and from lon 20° 29' to 32° 47' E. It is bounded N by Norway W by Sweden and the Gulf of Bothnia, and S by the Gulf of Finland. Length, from N to S 780 miles, breadth, near the centre only 112 miles, but towards the S, where it is greatest, 370 miles. Area, about 144,000 sq m. It includes a large part of Russian Lapland. The coast generally presents a face of bold and precipitous granite cliffs and is lined by numerous small islands and rocks, which make the navigation extremely dangerous. At the entrance to the Gulf of Bothnia are the Åland Islands. The interior is a vast table-land with an average height of from 400 to 600 feet above the sea. It is not, however, by any means a monotonous flat. The surface is much broken by hills and valleys and in the N rises into mountains which attain an elevation of somewhat more than 4000 ft. Many of the heights are bare, but the greater part of these of moderate elevation are covered with forests, chiefly of pine and fir and, in combination with the vast number of lakes enclosed by their bases, often form very romantic scenery. These sheets of water both by their number and individual extent constitute one of the most characteristic features of the country of whose surface they comprise about one-tenth. Among the most important are the Saima, Pääjärvi and Kalla, in the S where a great part of the surface is occupied by water. The Uleä near the centre and the Enare, at the extreme N discharging into the Arctic Ocean. Lake Ladoga indents the SE corner of Finland. The lakes of Finland form the basins that receive the greater part of the streams. Their waters are afterwards discharged into the sea by rivers generally of no great length but very wide and deep. There are vast areas of swamp. The climate varies much according to locality. In Lapland, in the N it is polar but somewhat tempered. Farther S the winter begins in the middle of October and continues to the middle of May but even during the coldest season thaws of several days duration are not infrequent. Spring appears suddenly and continues for about a month. The summer months are hot and dry. The soil is fertile. The principal crops are rye, oats and potatoes. A great part of the land owing to the nature of the surface and climate, is fit only for pastures. Large numbers of cattle and sheep are reared and much butter is exported. In the N where vegetation is almost confined to the growth of moss and lichen other domestic animals are superadded by the reindeer of which great herds are kept. The forests, which cover half the country are exploited on a large scale and, in addition to timber pitch and resin, yield great quantities of wood pulp for the Finnish paper mills. Hunting is an important industry. Iron, copper and tin are mined and some gold is obtained by washing in the extreme N. A great number of quarries of excellent granite have been opened, chiefly on the borders of the lakes or sea-coasts and from them blocks of extraordinary magnitude and beauty are obtained. There are about 1400 miles of railway. The merchant marine numbers over 2000 vessels. The population of Finland in 1891 was 2,369,140. In 1901 2,744,982. The bulk of the inhabitants consist of Finns a people of Ugric (Uralo-Altaic) stock. One-seventh of the people speak Swedish. The Russians still number but a few thousand. All but a small part of the inhabitants are Protestants. The literacy is almost unknown in Finland. At the head of the educational institutions is the University of Helsingfors. Female education receives great attention. Up to the fifteenth century the Finns were pagans. In the course of that century and the next the country was conquered by the Swedes. In 1721 the part of Finland which forms the province of Viborg was secured to Peter the Great by the treaty of Nystad. The bulk of the country was conquered from the Swedes by Alexander I in 1809-9. The grand-duchy of Finland forms a separate division of the Russian empire, and until the last few years preserved its old constitution. Its autonomy has been in a great measure abolished by the recent acts of the Russian government. A governor general representing the emperor resides in Helsingfors, the capital. He is at the head of an imperial senate, which is the executive body in the government. Peer estates have been represented in the national legislature—nobles, clergy, burghers, and peasants. Administratively Finland is subdivided into 8 läns or provinces. The largest town after Helsingfors is Åbo.

Flackville, flam-bé, a former country or district of Europe now included in the Netherlands, Belgium and France. It stretched along the North Sea from the Scheldt to the entrance of the Strait of Dover. The name occurs for the first time in the seventh century. The cession of the territory into a county a fief of France, took place in the ninth century. Flanders was united with Burgundy in 1384 and with Spain (along with the rest of the Netherlands) in 1516. A portion was conquered by Louis XIV. of France 165-79. The Spanish Netherlands passed to Austria in 1713-14 and ultimately became the kingdom of Belgium (See BELGIUM). French Flanders is now included mainly in the department of Nord

The Dutch possess the most northerly portion of Flanders which is included in the province of Zealand. The remainder the great bulk of old Flanders still retains its ancient name and forms the provinces of East and West Flanders, in Belgium the capitals of which are respectively Ghent and Bruges. At the close of the Middle Ages and at the time of the Reformation Flanders was one of the chief seats of trade, manufactures and art in Europe. In historical writing the name is often applied loosely in a broad sense to designate a more extensive portion of the Netherlands. The Flemish language is spoken by about half of the inhabitants of Belgium — Adj. Flemish which Flemish (The French of both is FLAMANNAIS). See EAST FLANDERS and WEST FLANDERS

Florence (It. Firenze, for-né or Fr Florence, fo-réna; Ger. Florenz, fo-rénz and Floren Ha) a city of Tuscany, Italy 143 miles NNW of Rome and 50 miles ENE of Leghorn. Lat. (observatory) 43° 45' 14" N. lon. 11° 10' 21" E. It is charmingly situated at the foot of the Apennines, on the river Arno. The river divides it into two unequal parts (the larger being on the V side) and is crossed by six bridges the most famous of which are the Ponte della Santa Trinità and the Ponte Vecchio the latter which is lined with goldsmith-shops, affording a passageway between the Pitti and Uffizi palaces. The Ponte Vecchio was built in its present form by Taddeo Gaddi in 1342. On either side of the Arno is a spacious quay called the Lung' Arno (along the Arno) a favorite lounge or promenade of the Florentines. The site of the old walls, the gates of which have been preserved has been converted into spacious streets and promenades, the broad Viale circoscribing the town on the right bank. The older streets are generally narrow, but well paved with flag stones. Many of the private dwellings are handsome and the palaces, of which there are a great many (Strozzi, Rucellai, Riccardi) the old palace of the Medici, etc.) are noble and impressive structures. Many of these are magnificently fitted up and contain extensive libraries and valuable collections of paintings. Such are the world famous palaces and art-treasures of the Pitti and Uffizi, with masterpieces by the greatest artists in painting and sculpture. The latter structure, erected by Vasari in 1560-1574, also contains the national library, with 500 000 volumes, and some of the richest treasures of literature to be found anywhere. The city contains numerous piazzas or squares, the most important of which, and the centre of public life is the Piazza della Signoria, having on two sides the Palazzo Vecchio formerly the seat of the Signoria and now the town hall and the magnificent open vaulted hall known as the Loggia dei Lanzi erected in 1376. In this square Savonarola was burned at the stake in 1498.

The most striking building in Florence, and perhaps the most remarkable of its kind in Europe is the Duomo or cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore (began in 1296) situated in a spacious square, nearly in the centre of the city. It is a stupendous edifice, with a dome, the largest in the world, executed by Filippo Brunelleschi in the first half of the fifteenth century. Its facade was not completed till the seventeenth century. The building is 556 feet in length with the dome inclusive of the lantern 352 ft. in height. Its magnificent campanile begun by Giotto in 1334, rises to 293 ft. Opposite the gates of the cathedral is the small octagonal church of St. John (San Giovanni) now used as a general baptistery for the city and known as the Battista, the three bronze gates of which one by Andrea Pisano and the other two by Lorenzo Ghiberti are celebrated as the most beautiful castings extant. Near by is the cathedral museum opened in 1891. Few of the other churches, the number of which is said to be 170, exhibit any remarkable architectural excellence, though in many instances their internal decorations are imposing. The most noted of these are the churches of Santa Croce, frequently styled the Parthenon of Florence, and containing the remains of Michelangelo Alfieri, Machiavelli, and others; San Lorenzo with the sacristy containing the famous Medici monuments by Michelangelo and Santa Maria Novella. The three market places, the Mercato Vecchio, Mercato Centrale and the Mercato Nuovo are deserving of notice. The gallery (loggia) of the latter was built by Cosmo I., from designs by Tasso. These markets are at times supplied with a profusion of the most gorgeous flowers. Immediately behind and extending SW from the Palazzo Pitti are the Boboli Gardens, about 1½ miles in circumference. In the western part of the city on the bank of the Arno, is the beautiful public park called the Cascina. Among the other buildings and institutions of the city are the Bargello, now fitted up as the national museum; the museum or monastery of San Marco, the Lauretina

Library, the Marcian Library, academy of fine arts, museum of natural sciences, archaeological museum, Royal Institute (with philosophical, scientific, and medical faculties), etc. The Laurentian Library, a long and lofty gallery contains about 10,000 ancient MSS. equalled in importance by no collection except that of the Vatican. There are other libraries with large and excellent collections. The Accademia della Crusca, founded towards the close of the sixteenth century is one of the most celebrated learned bodies in the world. The charitable institutions of the city are many and important and some of them are of very ancient date, that of the Misericordia existing for nearly 600 years. Literary and educational establishments are numerous.

The manufactures of Florence have greatly fallen off but silk worms are still reared to a considerable extent, and woollens, silk, straw hats, porcelain, mosaics, glass, and pietra dura are manufactured as also numerous objects in the fine arts (sculptures in marble, alabaster, etc.) but the chief dependence of the city is on the visits and temporary residences of foreigners. The character of the climate (mean temperature of January about 40° of July 75°—extreme, 103°) which is in general fine, though somewhat foggy in autumn, the cheapness and abundance of provisions, and the beauty of the city itself as well as that of its delightful vicinity, studded with villas, country houses, and gardens, render Florence one of the most attractive places of residence in Italy. Among the most charming spots in the suburbs of the city are the church and cemetery of San Miniato and Fiesole. Florence is an archbishop's see.

Florence holds a conspicuous place in the history of modern Italy. It owes its origin to a colony of Roman soldiers sent thither by Octavianus (Augustus) to whom he allotted part of the territory of the colony of Fiesole, established about forty years before by Sulla. As early as the fourth century a bishop of Florence attended a council at Arles. In the twelfth century the city became a republic. It had by this time risen into importance through the industry of its inhabitants, who had commercial establishments in the Levant, France, and other parts of Europe, and had become money changers, money lenders, jewellers, and goldsmiths. The city occupies the foremost place in the history of the Renaissance. In the fourteenth century Dante, Giotto, Petrarch, and Boccaccio shed lustre upon it. In the first half of the sixteenth century Florentine art culminated in Michelangelo. Towards the end of the fourteenth century the wealthy family of the Albizzi became chief rulers in Florence. These again were overthrown in 1434 from which time the power of the illustrious family of the Medici was supreme to the republic. Under them Florence rose to extraordinary splendour. In 1569 the Florentine dominions were erected into the grand duchy of Tuscany. Florence was the capital of Tuscany until 1859 and the capital of Italy from 1845 to 1871. Pop. in 1901 304,959.

Florida do-rah-da (Sp. pron. flah-ro-da) the southeast extremity of the American Union consisting mainly of a peninsula, which with the opposite peninsula of Yucatan and the intervening W portion of the island of Cuba forms the eastern barrier of the Gulf of Mexico separating that body of water into the Mediterranean of the New World. The state is bounded N by Alabama and Georgia, E by the Atlantic Ocean, S by the Straits of Demini or Florida Strait, and the Gulf of Mexico, and W by the Gulf of Mexico and Alabama. Area, 68,688 sq. m. Its extreme limits (including the keys) are in lat. 24° 30' and 31° N. and lon. 79° 38' and 81° 38' W.

Face of the country—The whole peninsula (375 miles long and 90 miles in average breadth) is low lying, few hills being the height of 200 feet above sea level and with the highest point about 350 ft. (Brooksville, 326 ft.). There are innumerable lakes, of which the largest is the shallow Okeechobee in the S, about 35 miles in length and with a depth of 10-20 feet. Swamps and marshes are numerous including the Everglades in the S covering more than two million acres the Kissimmee and Cypress swamps N of Lake Okeechobee and the Okeechobee swamp which is mostly in the state of Georgia but extends southward into this state for a considerable distance. Springs are abundant, and often discharge copious supplies of water and in many cases the waters have saline and other mineral constituents which impart valuable curative qualities. An effort to reclaim the swamp-lands in the S by affording a direct outlet for the waters of Lake Okeechobee through the Caloosahatchie River has not proved fully successful. There are numerous rivers several of which (the St. John, Ocklawaha, Hillsboro Caloosahatchie Apalachicola, St. Mary, etc.) are navigated by steamers, their courses in some instances being directed through a swamp or flooded forest, affording singular aspects of scenery. The Kissimmee River, which drains a considerable part of the south-central of the peninsula, is tributary to Lake Okeechobee. The Indian River in the SE is a long arm of the ocean which is separated off by a discontinuous narrow sand spit. The coast-line extends nearly 1300 miles. There are numerous bays, sounds, and lagoons, particularly along the Gulf coast, and they are generally shut in from the sea by keys and low spits composed of sand, broken coral and shells. A few of the southern keys are covered with hard, rocky knolls. Many are grassy or clothed with a jungle of shrubs and trees which are West Indian rather than North American in character and some of the keys have a good soil. The principal harbors and ports are Fernandina, Jacksonville on the St. John, St. Augustine, and Miami, on the E coast, Key West, in the S. Punta Rassa, Charlotte Harbor Tampa Bay Tampa, Cedar Keys, Apalachicola, and Pensacola, on the Gulf side.

Geology and Minerals—The greater part of the state belongs to the Tertiary and Post-Tertiary periods, and is constructed of limestone and overlying loose sands, with marginal areas of shell rock and coral-reefs. Reef structures of any magnitude are found only in the Everglades tract. The principal mineral products of the state are shell and coral limestone coquina a useful shell-conglomerate employed as a building material, clay suitable for making pottery and bricks lime-phosphates extensive deposits of which, in some places rich in mammalian and reptilian remains, are found through a large extent of the peninsula and a peaty material which is abundant in the swamps and low hammocks, but is not much utilized for any industrial purpose. Bog-iron ore exists in some parts.

Animal Life—Among the game animals are deer a small variety of the black bear the raccoon and the opossum. The Florida lion (or panther) is apparently still an inhabitant of the more forested districts. Alligators abound in lakes and streams, and a true crocodile is found in Biscayne Bay. The manatee or sea-cow which formerly browsed in great numbers along the shores, is now not common. Wild turkeys are abundant and water fowl and other game birds were until recently extremely plentiful in the more remote sections of the state, where flocks of heron spoon bill flamingo, ibis, and Carolina parrot were a feature in the life of the land. Among the valuable food fishes are shad pompano black and other bass, sheepshead, mullet, grouper, etc. The tarpon is the most sought-after among the large game fishes. The green turtle is often taken among the keys. The rattlesnake and water moccasin among venomous serpents, are common and there are numerous jacarandians of which the anolis or Florida chameleon is the best known. In the marshy regions insect pests are abundant. In the southern sounds the taking of sponges is an important industry. Much of the wild land is well adapted to pasturage.

Soil Vegetation Agriculture—All qualities of soil are found, from the pine barrens which produce little besides lumber and forest products to the fertile hammock lands some of which are as productive as any soil in the world. When ditched and drained, the swamp lands are often very valuable. Next in value are the low hammock lands, which are highly prized and very prolific. High hammock lands are less durable and require more fertilizing than the lower ones. The natural vegetation of Florida is very rich and the state is capable of affording abundant supplies of timber and forest products. The long leaved pine the excellent (evergreen) live-oak juniper (or red cedar) hickory and other timbers are extensively sawn and exported. Among the rare trees is the Turkey or stinking yew and in the extremes S grow the mahogany the deadly manchineel Jambelon kino cashibou gum trees, satin wood, lignum vitae, Indian almond tree, coconut, canella, and other trees which are seen nowhere else in the United States. Several species of palmetto are found in the state. The Zamia integrifolia a cycad, grows in the SE. abundantly, and from its root a starch called Florida arrowroot has been produced. The swamp-lands are largely overgrown with the cypress (Taxodium) with which are associated the evergreen-oak and (in the south) the palmetto or climbing fig (rubber). Low growths of mangrove occur many of the outlying islands along the coast and in the harbors. Of cotton both the long and the short staple kinds are grown. Sugar cane is chiefly raised along the Gulf coast. Indian-corn and rice are the principal cereals and the latter grain is well adapted to the climate and soils of Florida. An important and lucrative industry is the cultivation of early garden vegetables for the northern markets. The vine grows here to perfection and some attention has been given to the manufacture of wine. A great deal of capital has been profitably invested in the planting of orange groves, the oranges of Florida being of excellent quality. Fig, lime, lemon, guava, pomegranates olives and other subtropical fruits do finely in the larger portion of the state. In the S are grown pineapples, bananas, etc. Tobacco is largely grown. The rearing of west cattle is a very important occupation in the S and W. The total area of land under cultivation in 1900 was somewhat over 1,000,000 acres. The value and production of the principal crops in 1900 were cotton, valued at $2,312,680; corn, 4,654,774 bushels; peanuts, 1,210,223 bushels, sweet potatoes, 2,268,788 bushels sugar-cane (equalling 65,000 barrels of syrup) $645 913 tobacco, 969 384 pounds, oranges 334,466 boxes and pineapples 197 800 crates. The orange and pineapple product has very largely increased since 1900.

The climate is singularly equable the state has so far B that it only exceptionally experiences severe cold and its summer heat is tempered and modified by the sea on either hand. A winter temperature of 17° has been recorded at Tampa. The maximum temperature is about 104°, and the average for the year at Jacksonville is 69° at Key West, 77°. Notwithstanding the copious rainfall there are occasional severe droughts. Many thousands yearly make Florida a winter resort, and large numbers of consumptives and other invalids have found the climate of the dry pine regions very beneficial. Malarial and remittent fevers prevail in some sections, and yellow fever is an occasional visitant of the seaports.

Manufactures etc.—The manufacture of pine lumber, spars, live-oak ship-timber and naval-stores (rosin, tar, oil of turpentine, etc.) the tanning and preparation of sponges for market, and the cigar-manufacture (of which Key West is the seat) are all industries of importance. The value of the tobacco production was, in 1900 $10 897 236. Pensacola is now the principal seat of the lumber trade. The lumber and timber products for the year 1900 were valued at $10 843,403. The manufacture of tar and turpentine at $1 94 101. In 1889 the production of phosphate was about 450 000 tons. In 1903 its value was $2 966 674. The fisheries employ some capital chiefly in the north. Salt is made by solar evaporation and cotton-seed oil and oil-cakes are made and exported. Alligator skins are prepared for the manufacture of boots and shoes quite largely. Palm-leaf hats and braids are important articles of domestic manufacture.

Railroads.—The railroad facilities of Florida have increased in recent years to a remarkable degree, and now give easy communication with the greater part of the state. The length of running lines was in 1900 3395 miles.

Education.—The public institutions for higher education are the State Agricultural College at Lake City the East Florida Seminary at Gainesville the Florida State College at Tallahassee a state normal school at De Funiak Springs and the State Normal and Industrial College at Tallahassee. There are numerous private and denominational institutions of various grades (several of them for the higher education of negroes). Among the most important are Rollins College at Winter Park (Congregational) the John B. Stetson University at De Land (Baptist) the Florida Confederate College at Southland, and the Florida Baptist College and Cookman Institute (for colored) at Jacksonville.

Counties and Towns.—There are 43 counties, namely Alachua, Baker, Bradford, Brevard, Calhoun, Citrus, Clay, Columbia, Dade, De Soto, Duval, Escambia, Franklin, Gadsden, Hamilton, Hernando, Hillsborough, Holmes, Jackson, Jefferson, Lafayette, Lake, Lee, Leon, Levy, Liberty, Madison, Manatee, Marion, Monroe, Nassau, Orange, Osceola, Pasco, Polk, Putnam, Saint John, Santa Rosa, Sumter, Suwannee, Taylor, Volusia, Wakulla, Walton, and Washington. Among the important towns are Tallahassee, the capital (pop. in 1900 2001). Key West (17 114). Jacksonville (28 428). Pensacola the seat of a United States navy yard (17 747). Tampa (15 839). St. Augustine (4272). Fernandina (3345). Miami, Palatka, Orlando, Lake City and Ocala.

Government.—The constitution now in force was adopted in 1885. The governor is chosen for a term of four years as are the state senators 32 in number while the 65 members of the assembly are elected for two years. Judges are appointed and elected for a term of six years. Florida sends 3 members to the United States house of representatives.

History.—Florida was discovered in 1513 by Juan Ponce de Leon, who gave the region its name because he landed there on Easter Sunday (Sp. Pascua Florida). The name was by the Spanish writers of that day given to a great territory lying to the N and W also. In 1521 Ponce de Leon embarked upon the conquest of Florida, but the expedition ended in disaster and he died of a wound. In 1539 Hernando de Soto marched through the region. The permanent settlement dates from 1565 when the Spaniards founded the town of St. Augustine. Spain held possession of Florida until the Peace of Paris in 1763 which conveyed it to England. England was forced to restore it to Spain in 1763. The region was divided into East and West Florida, the Apalachicola River being the dividing line. West Florida (as claimed by Spain) extended to the Mississippi River. Part of West Florida (ceded by Spain to France) passed to the United States in the Louisiana purchases of 1803, and in 1812-13 the United States took possession of the part between the Pearl and Perdido rivers.

In 1818 the United States concluded a treaty with Spain for the cession of Florida, and in 1821 the transfer was made. In 1822 the territorial government was organized. In 1835 began the terrible war with the Seminoles Indians, whose remnants in 1846 were for the most part induced to remove to the Indian Territory. The state was admitted to the Union in 1845. Florida passed an ordinance of secession in 1861. The state was not re-admitted to representation in Congress until 1865.

Length from N to S 240 miles. Area, 17,000 sq. m. exclusive of a number of islets that belong to it. Formosa is traversed by several ranges of slaty and schistose mountains, which are mainly of Tertiary age, and culminates in Mount Morrison (officially known as Nishankajama, the new high mountain) 13,595 feet another lofty summit is Mount Fylin (Patsan, the snow mountain) 11,230 ft. A volcanic chain with active and extinct cones is found in the N. Along the W coast stretches a broad alluvial plain. There are only two streams, one in North Taiwan and the other in South Taiwan, that are serviceable for navigation and both are known as Tamsui-kai (fresh-water rivers). The soil of the lower tracts and the more gentle slopes of the mountains is extremely fertile and well cultivated, and the climate is salubrious. Hot springs are numerous, and sulphur and petroleum exist in large quantities. There are vast deposits of coal and it is in great part of good quality and largely worked in the region between Kelang and Tamsui. Wheat, rice of superior quality, millet, maize, tea, sugar-cane, yams, sweet potatoes, indigo, peanuts, arum-roots, hemp, jute, and a variety of fruits and vegetables are among the cultivated products. The exports include tea, sugar, rice, camphor, camphor-oil, bamboo, coal, sulphur, hemp, jute, fruits, timber, etc. The main industries being the cultivation of tea and sugar-cane and the extraction of camphor and sulphur. The domestic animals are cattle, the buffalo, horse, and goat, sheep and hog. The population consists mainly of a number of tribes and clans supposed to be of Malayan stock of an aboriginal people whose ethnic affinities have not been established and of descendants of Chinese settlers (Hokien and Hakien). Chinese is spoken or understood by large numbers of the non-Chinese inhabitants. The chief ports include Tamsui, Keelung, Tainan, Takow, and Anping. The Dutch exercised sovereignty over part of Formosa during a portion of the seventeenth century. The island was ceded by China to Japan in 1895. Under Japanese rule the construction of railways has been vigorously prosecuted. The population, exclusive of the wild tribes of the interior mountains, was in 1900 2,339,015 (including 32,405 in the dependent Pescadore Islands) of which number 32,000 were Japanese.

France (L. Gallia, later Francia or Fr. France, frōm; It. Francia, frān chā, Sp. Francia, frān thā; Ger.

Frankreich, frānk'rix) a republic, constituting the most western portion of central Europe, lying between lat. 43° 26' and 51° N and lon 4° 46' W and 10° 30' E. It is bounded N by the English Channel the Strait of Dover, and Belgium, W by the Atlantic Ocean E by Spain and the Mediterranean Sea, E. by Italy Switzerland and the German Empire and NE. by the German Empire, Luxembourg, and Belgium. The outline of the country is that of a pentagon with a prominent projection formed by the peninsula of Brittany. Area, 203,067 sq m exclusive of Corsica (3368 sq m) which is 113 miles distant at its nearest point. The coast-line—consisting largely of chalk cliffs in the N. of heaving heights in Brittany of extremely flat reaches in the SW (the Landes) and of lagoons (étangs), lagoon lands, and mountains in the SE—has a length of about 1800 miles, of which 800 fall upon the Bay of Biscay 600 upon the English Channel and 360 upon the Mediterranean (Gulf of Lyons).
Relief of the Land—The surface features of France are very varied. The greater part of the land lying NW of a line joining Navarre on the SW with Luxembourg on the NE is maritime lowland rising but little above sea-level, or depressed interior basin (Paris Basin) and eroded plateau the occupancy of which by the sea in a comparatively late geological period is well attested by the evidence of organic remains. Few points in this region exceed 600 feet in height, and only one (in the hills of Normandy) overpasses 1300 ft. The south-central part of France is occupied by what is frequently known as the Central Plateau, a height of land which has plateau characteristics on its western side but eastward passes off into abrupt and rugged mountains known in their different parts as the Cévennes, the mountains of Vivarais, of Beaujolais of Charolais, the Côte d'Or, etc. which fall off into the depressions of the Rhone and Saône. The loftiest summit of the Cévennes is Mont Mézenc, 5750 ft. The Cévennes range is continued northward to an elevated plateau called the Plateau de Langres. Forming an integral part of the Central Plateau—which is geologically perhaps the most ancient part of France—is the volcanic country of Auvergne, with its vast lava-fields, volcanic knobs and cones, and still beautifully preserved craters and hot springs. This region of recently extinguished volcanic fires is occasionally one of the most distinctive of France,—indeed, of the whole of Europe. Of its better known summits are the Pay-de-Dôme, Pay-de-Sancy (of the Mont Dore group) and the Pithou de Cantal the last-named being the highest 8093 ft. (See Auvergne). The remaining mountains of France are the forested Ardennes, on the borders of Belgium the Vosges forming part of the boundary with Germany the Jura, on the Swiss frontier (with the highest summit of the entire system the Crêt de la Neige) the Alps which occupy nearly the whole of the country lying S. and E. of the valley of the Rhone, and whose divisions, known as the Pennine Graian Cottian and Maritime Alps, form the boundary with Italy and the Pyrenees, which form the entire boundary with Spain. France shares with Italy in the possession of the highest summit of the Alps, Mont Blanc 15 782 ft. Other lofty summits of the Alps lying within France are Monte Viso, Mont Jura and Mont Pelvaux. Although the culminating point of the Pyrenean line within the Spanish border, summits scarcely less high (Pic de Vignemale, 10 792 ft.) belong to France in which is also centred the grandest scenery of the entire mountain-system the upper valley of the Garonne. See ALPS PYRENEES, JURA etc.
Rivers Lakes—None of the rivers of France are of the first magnitude and but few are navigable, except for minor craft, for long distances. The chief streams are the Loire, the longest, with a length of some 600 miles. Rhone (whose principal affluent is the Saône) Seine (which receives the Marne and Oise) Garonne (with the Dordogne tributary to the important tide-water estuary the Gironde) Meuse and Moselle, the last two belonging to the basin of the Rhine. The five river basins represented by these waters affect the drainage of the great bulk of the country which in the main is directed northward, or along the line of broad slope of the land. The Rhone is the only stream of consequence whose course is directed to the Mediterranean. Most of the streams of France, owing to marked fluctuations in water level and in intercepting rapids, are made available for navigation only through the aid of canalized arms or channels. Among the rivers, in addition to those mentioned above, are the Somme, Orne, Vilaine, Sarthe, Mayenne, Loire, Allier, Vienne, Tarn, Lot, Isère, Durance, Charente, Adour, Aude, Hérault, Var, Aisne, Yonne, and Eure. The Loire gives water communication through the centre of France to Roanne, 450 miles from its mouth; the Seine to Rouen for vessels of 300 tons, and for such as draw no more than 6 feet, to Paris, 116 miles inland in a direct line; the Rhone for good-sized vessels to Lyons 218 miles from Marseilles; and the Garonne to Toulouse, and for small craft to Castres 260 miles from its embouchure. The lakes of France are few in number and of small size the largest (not reckoning Lake Geneva, on the border) being the semi-Alpine lakes Annecy and Bourget, both lying E. of the valley of the Rhone. Numerous lagoons are scattered through the tide-water lowlands of the Mediterranean and Biscay coasts, in a region of retreating seas and strong sedimentation.

Climate, Products.—Taken as a whole, the climate of France is one of the finest in Europe, though from the extent of the country and the diversity of conditions in different localities, considerable variations occur. Thus the climate of the northeast is continental, while that of the northwest is oceanic, resembling the climate of Great Britain. The Mediterranean districts again, are affected by the burning winds of Africa, the mistral often proving very destructive to vegetation around the mouths of the Rhone and Var. S of lat. 46° there are about 134 rainy days in the year, N of this parallel, 120. The mean annual rain fall for the whole of France is 29½ inches, ranging from a minimum of 10 inches to 71 inches in the western Pyrenees. At Toulon the mean annual temperature is 63° Fahr. at Marseilles, 59° 0' at Bordeaux 56° at Nantes, 55° at Paris, 51° at Deenhik 50° 5'. Most exceptional extremes of -18° and 104° have been noted at Paris.

A popular climatic division of France is into districts in accordance with the characteristic vegetable product of each. The southernmost district, that bordering on the Mediterranean has been called the olive region. The second, whose northern limit is a line drawn in a NE. direction from the department of Gironde to the Vosges has maize as its characteristic product. The third reaches to a line drawn from the mouth of the Loire to the town of Mésières in Ardennes and is the extreme northern limit of the profitable cultivation of the vine. All beyond this constitutes the fourth region of which wheat may be regarded as the staple.

Natural and planted forests cover nearly one-seventh of France, the principal localities being the Ardennes, the Vosges, the Plateau de Langres, the Jura range and the Cévennes. Along the Bay of Biscay a forest of sea-pine has been formed extending over a length of 100 miles. The oak elm beech and pine are the prevailing trees. Of per-barns more importance than any other on account of the great national industry with which it is associated, is the silk-mulberry. The olive is a southern product, as well as the orange, lemon almond fig pistachio, and asper. The date and eucalyptus are among the introduced shade and ornamental trees of the French Riviera. The apple, pear plum and cherry are the leading fruit trees N of the vine region.

A peculiar economic feature of French agriculture is the excessive subdivision of the soil as a result in great part of the prevailing law of inheritance. The cereal crop is by far the most important. France is next to Russia the greatest wheat-producing country of Europe the product being about half of that of the United States. Potatoes are largely cultivated as also beets for sugar. Hemp flax rape, hops and tobacco are also among the products. But in the grape district the most important industry is the cultivation of the vine. In this department of husbandry France is unsurpassed, the various high class wines it produces, under the names of Champagne, Burgundy Bordeaux etc having the highest repute. The area of land under vine cultivation was, in 1900 1 730 451 hectares (the hectare being equal to 2.47 acres) which gave a wine product of 8 353 000 hectolitres (the hectolitre being equal to about 22 gallons). In some districts the chestnut forms a considerable part of the food of the people. The northern part of France produces excellent elder and perry. The annual product of raw silk is between 4 000 000 and 5 000 000 pounds. It was much greater formerly. Considerable areas of France, consisting of moors, naked limestone, swamps and marshes are wholly unproductive or true waste-lands and it is thought that they might be hardly less than one-seventh of the full area of the land.

The fauna of the greater part of France is essentially west European differing little from the fauna of the bordering countries and having few marked elements that are distinctive of it. Few of the larger mammalian types, such as the wolf bear and boar are now to be met with beyond the forested mountain-fastnesses—the Ardennes Vosges Cévennes and Pyrenees more particularly—or the game-preserves, but in inaccessible regions these animals are still abundant and the ravages committed by wolves are still considerable. The chamois and ibex belong to the lofty Alpine regions.

Mines.—France is a great coal-producing country. The coal-fields are found in nearly half of the departments. The most important are those of Valenciennes, in the department of Nord, and Saint-Etienne, in that of Loire. The output is insufficient for the needs of the country so that a large import takes place every year from England and Belgium. The total coal product in 1900 was 48 548 700 tons, of which about 1 200 000 tons were exported. The imports of coal during the same year amounted to 14,699 050 tons. Iron is obtained from most of the coal-fields and from beds in other departments also from seams in the mountain-limestones of the Jura and from the crystalline rocks of the Alps, Pyrenees and Vosges. The number of mines worked is about 350 and the quantity of iron produced in 1900 was about 2,760 000 tons. Copper lead zinc, manganese, and antimony are also mined, but the product is not very large. France abounds in marbles and building sandstone (Fontainebleau sandstone) and in excellent gypsum (plaster of Paris). A fine lithographic stone is found in the department of Gard. Excellent millstones are obtained in several localities, the best being from La Ferté-sous-Jouarre.

Manufactures.—Owing to the minute subdivision of the land, the agricultural population greatly outnumbers the manufacturing so that France cannot with propriety be called a manufacturing country. The manufacture of textiles is by far the most important industry. Woollen, silk cotton and linen fabrics are all produced on a vast scale. Among the principal seats of the textile industry are Lyons (unrivalled for its silks) Rouen Lille, Roubaix, Paris, Rheims, Amiens, Elbeuf, Tournon, Cambrai Valenciennes, and Saint-Etienne (ribbons). Far famed are the tapestries and carpets of Paris, Aubusson and Beauvais and the porcelain and glass of Sévres, Paris and Limoges. The manufacture of lace is extensively carried on, especially in some of the northern departments. France occupies a prominent place in the manufacture of iron and steel products, the principal seats of which are in the north and east. The steel-works of Le Creusot are among the largest in Europe. Saint-Etienne is the chief centre of the manufacture of fire-arms. Other manufactures are beet-sugar, leather paper chemicals musical instruments, hats gloves, luxury brass and steel-ware plates and flint-glass, confectionery and tobacco. The French especially excel in the manufacture of articles calling for taste ingenuity and delicate manipulation. Many industries of this description, such as the manufacture of gold and silver ware and jewelry, have their chief seat in the capital. Among other products may be noted Gobelins tapestry costly shawls, articles of vertu clocks, watches philosophical and surgical instruments, furniture, carriages, and works in ivory. Besides what is used for home consumption France exports enormous quantities of wine and brandy the most famous brand of the latter being that produced at Cognac.

The principal commercial ports of France are Marseilles, Havre, Bordeaux Dunkirk, Cette, Rouen, Boulogne, Saint-Nazaire, and Calais. The leading items of export are textiles and materials that go into the making of textiles, wine and brandy leather and leather goods, articles of apparel skins and furs, chemicals and manufactures of iron and steel. Great Britain takes the largest share of the French exports. About an equal amount goes to Belgium Germany and the United States, combined. The merchant navy consisted in 1901 of 14 393 sailing vessels and 1249 steamers 13 603 vessels and steamers, the greater number of which were engaged in the coastwise trade, were of a tonnage not exceeding 50 tons. The railway system of France dates from the year 1825 when there were 24 miles of road. At the beginning of 1904 the mileage exceeded 28 000. The railways are almost entirely in the hands of six great companies. On Jan 1 1901 there were 8, 383 miles of telegraph lines, comprising 328 790 miles of wire.

The canals of France are numerous, the object being to connect all the great water basins and thereby give a continuous water-communication through the interior and from sea to sea. Thus the Canal du Midi, or Canal of Languedoc, starting from a point in the Garonne a little below Toulouse, runs SSE. into the Etang de Thau completing a navigable communication between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean. The Canal du Centre, or of Charolais, the Rhone and Rhine Canal and the Canal of Burgundy pierce the barriers which isolated the basins of the Rhone, Loire, Seine, and Rhine, and give access from any one of these rivers to the other three. The Eastern Canal and the Marne-Saône canals unite Franche-Comté with Champagne and Flanders. A canal measuring 230 miles unites Nantes and Brest. France possesses canals having an aggregate length of 3000 miles. The rivers of France are navigable for the aggregate length of 8300 miles.

Government.—Previous to the revolution of 1789 the government of France was a despotism. Since then it has changed its form of government more frequently than any other country in the world. The legislative power is vested in an assembly of 2 houses,—the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate,—and the executive in a president. The Chamber of Deputies is elected by direct universal suffrage, the arrondissements (in some cases parts of arrondissements) constituting the electoral districts. There are at present 591 members the term of office is 4 years. The Senate is composed of 266 members, chosen by indirect election, the term of office being 9 years. There are still a few life senators, who entered the body previous to the amendment of the constitution in 1904. The colonies are represented in the chambers. The Senate has conjointly with the Chamber of Deputies the right of initiating and framing laws but financial measures must be first presented to and voted by the Chamber of Deputies. The president of the republic is elected by a majority of votes by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies united in a National Assembly. His term of office is 7 years. He has the initiative of legislation concurrently with the two chambers, promulgates laws enacted by them, has the right of pardon, disposes of the military force, appoints to all civil and military posts, including the heads of the ministerial departments, and may with the assent of the Senate, dissolve the Chamber of Deputies before the legal expiration of its term. The seat of government is Paris.

Communal and Departmental Administration.—The commune represents the elementary territorial unit. It comprises either a town (in the case of large places, part of a town) or one or more villages, with the adjacent rural districts and is governed by a mayor (maire) appointed by the government, and a municipal council elected by the inhabitants. Paris and Lyons have special municipal administrations.

The canton, the next higher unit, consists in most cases of 12 communes. It is not so much an administrative as a judicial division. Recruiting for the army takes place at the capital of the canton. The arrondissement the main subdivision of the chief territorial division of the department, is usually composed of 8 cantons. It is governed by a sub-prefect appointed by the president of the republic. He is assisted by a council consisting of as many members as there are cantons in the arrondissement. The department comprises generally 4 arrondissements. It is governed by a prefect, who is appointed by the president and is assisted by a council composed of as many members as there are cantons.

Religion.—All religions are equal before the law. Roman Catholics, 1½ millions, and Jews (and in Algeria the Mohammedans) have state allowances. All but about 2 per cent. of the population are Roman Catholics or profess no religion. The Protestants number less than 1,000,000 and the Jews about 50,000. The great bulk of the Protestants are Calvinists.

Education.—Nearly half the expenses connected with public instruction are defrayed by the state and the remainder by the departments. Schools are divided into 3 classes,—primary schools, secondary schools, and colleges and universities devoted to the higher instruction. Primary education is administered by the commune. Above the primary schools come the secondary schools in which classical or industrial education is given. In the higher education, 15 universities now take the place of the corps of faculties. These are the universities of Aix, Marseilles, Besançon, Bordeaux, Caen, Clermont-Ferrand, Dijon, Grenoble, Lille, Lyons, Montpellier, Nancy, Paris, Poitiers, Rennes, and Toulouse. There are free faculties supported by the church in a few of the principal cities. Among the famous institutions located in Paris are the Collège de France, the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes & la Sorbonne, the Ecole Normale Supérieure, the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers (applied sciences), the Museum of Natural History, the Polytechnic School for officers and state engineers, the Central School of Arts and Manufactures, the Ecole des Ponts et Chaussées (for civil engineers), the School of Fine Arts, the Conservatoire for musicians and actors, the School of Mines, and the school for living Oriental languages. National military schools are those of Paris, Le Flèche, Saint-Cyr, Fontainebleau, Versailles, Saumur, and Saint-Maixent. The Bibliothèque Nationale is the largest library in the world. The French Academy, constituting a section of the Institute of France, is the most famous of all learned bodies.

Army and Navy.—The effective force, in peace standing of the active army in 1903 was in France proper 613,985 men besides 54,774 men in Algeria and 13,514 in Tunisia. This is inclusive of the Gendarmes (22,339) and the Garde Républicaine (30,775). The number of men liable for active war service is estimated to be 2,350,000 besides the territorial army of 900,000 men. The first-class forts and fortifications are Paris, Belfort, Verdun, Briancourt, Lille, Denkirch, Arras, Douai, Lyons, Grenoble, Besançon, Toulon, Perpignan, Bayonne, Rochefort, Lorient, Brest, and Cherbourg. Paris is the greatest fortress in the world. The war navy (battle-ships, cruisers, torpedo-boats, destroyers, submarines) of France consists of about 384 vessels.

Colonies and Dependencies.—France stands next to Great Britain in the extent of her colonial possessions, but the area and population are both very much less. The island of Corsica is treated as an integral part of France. The colonies are in Africa, Algeria (and the Algerian Sahara), Tunis (protectorate), Senegal (Senegambia, with the French Niger territory), French Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Dahomey (and dependencies), French Congo, and the French Somali coast. In Asia, French Indochina, French Pondicherry, Madagagascar (these five in India), French Cochinchina, Cambodia, Annam, Laos, Tongking in the South Sea, New Caledonia (with the Loyalty and Chesterfield islands), the Marquesas, French Polynesia (Tahiti) or Low Archipelago, Gambier Islands, Clipperton and other islands in the Indian Ocean, Madagascar, Réunion, Comor-Bé, Mayotte, the Comoro Islands (protectorate) etc. New Amsterdam and the Kerguelen Islands and in America, French Guiana, the islands of Martinique, Guadeloupe, St. Bartholomew, Marie-Galante etc. in the West Indies and the islands of Saint Pierre and Miquelon, south of Newfoundland.

Pop. (est. n.)—According to the census of 1901 the population of France was 38,981,910 (an increase of only 618,753 over the population of 1891 (38,363,157)). The natural rate of increase of the population in France is lower than that of any other nation in western Europe. The rural portion constitutes about 70 per cent. of the population. The departments of France are the following:

Ain	Essonne	Marne
Alsace	Finistère	Mayenne
Allier	Gard	Meurthe-et-Moselle
Alpes-Maritimes	Haute-Garonne	Nièvre
Ardeennes	Haute-Loire	Nord

Lille	210,000	Nancy	133,106

The division of France into départements dates from 1790. Previous to the Revolution the country was divided into governments and provinces, the names of which still survive. These old divisions are: In the NW, Normandy, Maine, and Perche; in the N, Ile de France, Picardy, Artois, French Flanders and Champagne (with Briat) in the NE, Lorraine; in the E, Burgundy, Franche-Comté and Lyonnais; in the SE, Dauphiné and Provence; in the S, Languedoc, Roussillon and Foix; in the SW, Gascony, Béarn, French Navarre and Gascogne; in the W, Aquitaine, Saintonge, Angoumois, Poitou, Anjou and Brittany; in the centre, Touraine, Orléans, Nivernais, Berry, Bourdeaux, Auvergne, Limousin and Marche.

History.—France was known in ancient times as Gaul (Gallia), the country of the Gauls. In a broader sense Gaul embraced also a large part of northern Italy, Belgium and part of Holland and Switzerland. The portion now included in Italy was called Gallia Cisalpina, or Gaul on this side of the Alps; the bulk of Gaul being called Gallia Transalpina, or Gaul beyond the Alps. The Romans established themselves in the southwestern part of Transalpine Gaul in 125-121 B.C. In 52-51 B.C. the country was subjugated by Caesar. He found it inhabited by three main—the Aquitanians in the southwest, the Celts in the west, centre, and east, and the Belgians in the north and northeast. In the fifth century it fell completely into the power of the Visigoths, Burgundians and Franks. Clovis, the king of the Franks put an end to the last vestiges of Roman dominion in 486, was baptised in 496 and in 507-48 stripped the Visigoths of most of their Gallic territories thus ascending the sway of the Franks to the Pyrenees. In 534 the Franks subdued the Burgundians. Under Charlemagne (768-814) the Frankish realm attained great magnitude, embracing, in addition to modern France a large part of what is now Germany and Cisleithan Austria, as well as Italy (except the south), Switzerland, Holland Belgium and the northeast corner of Spain. This vast realm was partitioned among the grandsons of Charlemagne in 843. The monarchy of the western Franks became the kingdom of France. Under the descendants of Charlemagne the position of the king was soon reduced to that of an overlord, whose great vassals, the feudal dukes and counts became the hereditary heads of autonomous states the power of some of the vassals surpassing that of the king. Among the chief feudatory states were the county of Flanders (which finally lost loose from the French monarchy) the county of Vermandois (capital Saint-Quentin) the duchy of France (capital, Paris) the county of Champagne the duchy of Burgundy the county (later duchy) of Anjou the duchy of Aquitaine, the county of Toulouse and the duchy of Normandy (founded by the Normans about 911). The Carolingian dynasty under which France became thus split up, was succeeded in 987 by that of the Capetians, under whom the royal authority was gradually in a great measure, re-established. In 1066 William of Normandy conquered England and when in 1154 Henry Plantagenet ascended the English throne the western half of France, with the exception of Brittany (which was an independent state) was united with the English crown. In 1202-05 however Normandy, Maine, Poitou, Anjou and Touraine were wrested from England. In 1271 Languelec which had been ruled by the powerful counts of Toulouse was reunited with the French crown. Champagne soon followed and Dauphiné was acquired in 1349. In 1328 the Capetian dynasty was succeeded by the house of Valois. In the course of the first hundred years of the reign of this dynasty the English made themselves masters of a great part of France and the French monarchy was brought to the brink of dissolution but finally the tide of English conquest was arrested and by the middle of the fifteenth century, the French were once more in possession of their country. During this period Burgundy ruled by a branch of the house of Valois, had developed into a great power ruling the Netherlands. Louis XI (under whom the royal authority in France became supreme) in 1477 ceded the duchy of Burgundy (detached from the Netherlands) reunited Anjou with the French crown in 1480 and annexed Provence in 1481. In 1491, Brittany was united with France. The bishoprics of Metz, Toul and Verdun were wrested from the German Empire and annexed to France in 1552.

In 1569 the house of Bourbon succeeded to that of Valois. With its accession it became part of the French kingdom. About half a century later Artois, Roussillon and a great part of Alsace were annexed. Soon after French Flanders and Franche-Comté were conquered by Louis XIV who also took possession of Strasbourg. The year 1763 marks the downfall of France as a great colonial power Canada and Louisiana being relinquished by her as the result of the Seven Years War. Louisiana was recovered in 1800 but in 1803 it was sold to the United States. Lorraine became part of France in 1666, and in 1765 the island of Corsica was acquired from Genoa. In 1789 the abuses which had grown up under the despotic rule of the Bourbons brought about the Revolution and in 1792, France became a republic. In 1793 the old division into provinces gave way to that into departments. In 1791 Artois and Flanders which had belonged to the Papacy were annexed to France. Between 1793 and 1801 Belgium, Holland, Savoy a great part of Italy Switzerland, and the German territories W of the Rhine were brought under the sway or influence of republican France. Napoleon established the empire in 1804 and in the succeeding years tore away a large part of Austria and Prussia, broke up the German Empire, established the kingdom of Westphalia, took possession of Naples and the Papal States, and nearly achieved the conquest of the Spanish peninsula. With the downfall of Napoleon in 1814-15 France shrank back into her former limits. The Bourbons again ruled the country until 1830 when they were driven out and the house of Orleans (a branch of the Bourbon house) was installed in the person of Louis Philippe, under whom the conquest of Algeria, begun just before his accession, was achieved. In 1848 the second republic was established which was soon brought to an end by Louis Napoleon, who in 1852 established the second empire. The war of 1870-71 with Germany brought about the overthrow of Napoleon III and the establishment of the third republic, and caused the loss to France of Alsace and the German part of Lorraine. Since that war France has again become a considerable colonial power by securing control of Tunis, French Indo-China, Madagascar and extensive territories in Africa.

Frankfort-on-the-Main (Ger. Frankfurt-am-Main, frān-kfōrt ām mīn; L. Francofortium ad Mœnum, or Trasportum Francorum,—i. e. the ford of the Franks) a city of Prussia, in the province of Hesse-Nassau, previous to 1806 one of the free cities of Germany and capital of the German Confederation. Originally a Roman station Frankfort begins to figure in history in the time of Charlemagne, who had a favorite palace here. Subsequent emperors made it the seat of their court, granting it important privileges. In the thirteenth century it became a free city. After the days of Frederick Barbarossa it became the place of election of the German emperors and in 1356 Charles IV. in the charter known as the Golden Bull, still preserved in its archives, transformed this custom into a right. The later German emperors were also crowned here. Frankfort had a long career of almost uninterrupted prosperity till the wars of the French revolution brought upon it a series of disasters. Napoleon I. however befriended it, and made it the capital first of a principality and then of a grand-duchy. Upon his downfall it regained its independence, and the Congress of Vienna (1815) restored it to its precedency among the free towns and made it the seat of the German Diet, in which Frankfort had an independent vote. In 1866 Frankfort sided with Austria in the war against Prussia, in consequence of which it was annexed by the latter power.

Frankfort is situated in a spacious mountain bordered plain on the right bank of the Main; lat. 50° 0' N. lon. 8° 40' E. at an elevation of 300 feet above the sea. A large and fine suburb Sachsenhausen, stands on the left bank to which Frankfort proper is joined by several bridges. The suburbs, which include Bornheim and Bockenheim are very beautiful being studded with stately mansions and elegant villas. The old ramparts have been transformed into beautiful promenades, where attractive residences and resorts of amusement alternate with rural surroundings. The city is divided into two portions—the old town and the new town. The former consists mainly of a conglomerate of old and narrow streets and has for its centre the Römerberg or market-place (which for a long time was barred to Jews), containing the Justitia Fountain. In the old quarter the Zell has grown into a fine spacious street, the principal thoroughfare of the city. The famous Judenstrasse, Jews' street, has long lost its characteristics its gates having been levelled in the time of the French occupation in 1806. The streets of the new town are wide and handsome. The most fashionable quarter is the West End, contiguous to and beyond the Tannus Promenade. The Central Railway Station located in this section and erected in 1833-34, is one of the finest and most commodious railway stations in the world. The city contains handsome squares adorned with fine fountains and statues. Among these may be noted the Römermarkt with the monument to Gutenberg, the inventor of printing, the Goetheplatz, with the statue of Goethe, who was a native of this city and the Schillerplatz. Among the public buildings are the guild-hall, or Römer (so really a group of buildings) in which are the Wahlraum or hall of election where the electors met to choose a new emperor and the Kaiser-saal containing a famous collection of portraits of the old German emperors. The ancient cathedral of St. Bartholomew a Gothic structure begun in 1235 comprises the chapel in which the electors accepted the emperor after he had been elected at the high altar. Frankfort is rich in collections connected with literature and art as in its various museums and galleries as well as in societies designed to promote them. Among the city's more prominent or interesting buildings and institutions may be mentioned the Goethe Museum and the Goethe House (in which the poet was born); the municipal record-office the municipal library (with about 300,000 volumes); museum of art and industry the academy of social and commercial sciences the Rothschild library the new exchange, opera-house (opened in 1880) the new theatre and the Senckenberg museum. The city has both botanical and zoological gardens and an attractive palm-garden. The manufactures are not important, and are chiefly articles of vertu, jewelry, tapestry, wax-cloth, carpets, dyes and snuff, drugs and chemicals, machinery, electrical appliances etc. It is from its banking transactions that Frankfort derives its great wealth it being one of the principal financial centres of Europe. From its central situation Frankfort is the most important railway junction in Germany. Pop. in 1875 105,170; in 1890 136,810; in 1890 170,850; in 1900 288,989 exclusive of Bornheim Bockenheim and a number of minor suburban localities which have lately been united with the city. Average annual temperature, 50° maximum temperature, 80°

Frankfort-on-der-Oder (Ger. Frankfurt an der Oder, frān-kfōrt ān dēr o'der; L. Francofortium ad O'derum or V'adum) a city of Prussia, province of Brandenburg and capital of a government-district of the same name, on the left bank of the Oder and on the railway from Berlin to Breslau, 50 miles E. of the former city and in lat. 50° 22' N., lon. 14° 13' E. Its situation on a navigable river con-noted by canals with both the Vistula and the Elbe, gives it great advantages. It is a well-built town with several suburbs, one of which is on the right bank of the Oder and connected with the rest of the city by a newly constructed stone bridge. Among its churches, St. Mary's founded in the thirteenth century is worthy of notice for its large organ, richly gilt wood-carvings, and fine stained windows. The city has an imposing town hall, a theatre, and various academic institutions. Among its numerous monuments is one to William I., unveiled in 1900. Its manufactures comprise machines and boilers, fire-arms, musical instruments, stone- and metal-ware, silks, gloves, mustard, tobacco, and sugar. It has large distilleries and railway machine-shops. Pop. in 1870 47,180 in 1880 51,147 in 1890 55,738 in 1900 61,852.
